Of late years everything has been running to hot-air furnaces and steam-heating apflats has been reduced to a science. But only those who have been brought up in the country can realize the charm of the big, wide fireplace with its crackling back logs and bed of red hot embers that form themselves into so many fantastic shapes to fascinate the family gathered around. Did you ever notice how earnestly people gaze into a good fire? What do they see there, what thoughts does the tire suggest, that all who gather around it sooner or later find themselves staring vacantly at it, oblivious to all surroundings? What good cheer does it east over the house-OHLKE & LEADER hold to see the unsteady flicker of the flame and watch the dancing shadows on the floor? What is more consoling than to blow out the lamp, or to turn out the gas, and sit by the firelight alone with one's heers perched upon the fender? There's little of that in the city, but I believe there is going to be more of it - not open fireplaces, but
