THEY MEET AGAIN.

Decked in the sheenlest of white robes, Alene floated down the wide lawn of Ellerby Hall. Nestling in her gold-brown hair were rose-tipped apple-blossoms, and clustering over her dress were the same sweet-scented blooms which she had gathered from the queenly trees of he orchard not far away, where each stood out a perfect, dream of beauty against the pale-blue sky. Not more fairy-like were they, not more beautifully tinted, than Alene Elierby herself. So at least thought the young man who joined her-Raymond Ogere. But he sighed as he gazed upon the cretty vision before him, who had promised kerself to another only the av before Promised to marry Robert Willis, a man for whom Raymond felt some contempt, as being too superficial and weak to deserve the consideration of a girl like Alene Ellerby. Indeed, it had been a great surprise to him, for in his acquaintance with Alene he had studied well her character, and having seen something of the world and women, Raymond had felt that she inclined kindly toward himself, and some day he had hoped to win her for

"I have come to bid you good-by," he said, "for I am going away. Business requires me again in the city." She turned away her face when he ifted his eyes to meet hers. For, in the way people will, each looked while the other was not looking, and he had not seen the expression on her face when he announced his departure. The soft twilight was gathering about them, and though Raymond could see but little, he felt that her manner had grown reserved and quiet. Good-bye," he said again, as he held out his hand. "Good-bye,' was the reply in a low formal voice, as she laid her slim, cool fingers in his. He held them as he looked at her, and then he said in a wistful tone, a strange, sad expression glowing in his "I wish you would give me a bunch of those flowers that you wear." She loosened some and laid them in his hand. When he had left her he smiled bitter, grim smile. I had quite forgotten the significance of apple-blossoms. 'Preference!' What a mockery that she should give them to me when her preference is given to

So Alene stayed on for a while with her aunt in Ellerby Hall. Alene's mother was living, but her father had long been dead, and left them but a scant income.

Her aunt, Mrs. Ellerby, was also in moderate circumstances, for the Hall had now a heavy mortgage upon it, and it cost the good lady a struggle to maintain the old place that had grown so dear to her.

So Alene was not an heiress, or even a young kedy with rich relatives. The men who liked her at all, she had every reason to believe, loved her for herself alone. And as for Alene-well she was altogether too heedless and frank even to think twice when she fell in

The creature of romance, possessing the keen love of pleasure natural to or estates, would be thought of only as belonging to that surrounding halo of circumstances which made him great Her aunt had called Raymond Ogere had called Bob Willis a "foolish fop. Two days before Raymond Ogere's departure Alene astounded her aunt by saying she wished to go home. This announcement set Aunt Ellerby to pondering many things, for her niece usually wished to prolong her visits to the Hall. Bob Willis had been there only that afternoon, and she had seen him going down the gravelled walk, with a remarkably crestfallen air for such a young braggart as she considered him. "He is a prodigious numbskull, but his father is worth a mint," Aunt Ellerby had said to herself. Whatever conclusion the good lady arrived at concerning the state of affairs, she said to Alene the next morning at breakfast: "You see, dear, I am thinking of selling the Hall (I have had a fair offer for it), and going to live with Bess was her daughter, married, and living in Paris. Alene started. "Why, Aunt Nan, I thought you never meant to sell the place.

"Well, Bess urges me to come, and think I shall go. And, child, you may go along if your mother can pay the expenses of the voyage there. After that, between us, your mother and will manage to keep you there a sea son at least.

So within six weeks Alene and her aunt were well off on the dark blue sea. It was the month of July, a little past the popular season for travel, yet the steamers were still crowded, and almost the first person they encountered on board ship was Mr. Bob Willis. Whatever "set-down" Miss Alene had once given him, she was civil to him now, and his esteem for the young lady seemed to be in no wise lessened from the fact that she was en route to the old world. One day Mr. Bob found it necessary from decrease of temperature, to put on a thicker coat than he had been wearing. Leaving his state-room hur-ALEX. ROSS'S DEPILATORY removes hair | riedly, he unconsciously dropped from one of his pockets some papers.

Some one, treading the passage shortly afterward, saw this trail of literature, and stooping, picked them up. This some one chanced to be Miss Alene Ellerby. One of these papers was flattened and dust-worn. Certainly Miss Alene knew better that to read what did not belong to her, yet she was perusing with wideopen eyes the writing on this soiled paper. First she had been attracted because the chirography seemed to resemble her own, next when she saw her own name appended. Well, since that name is there, we will read, too. "Dear Bob.-You have surprised me, yet I confess I am not wholly displeased at your proposal. Please call this evening.—Yours Alene Ellerby.

This was re-written again and again all over the sheet, each copy growing nearer and nearer to a likeness of her own hand. She dropped the paper and thought. Then she looked again at the date and drew a great sigh. It was dated May 14th, the bay before Raymond Ogere bade her good-bye. Well, Alene neither fainted away, nor did she face Mr. Willis with a scathing glance of scorn or any tragic phrases. She only left the other papers where she had found them, treated into her state-room, with the one clenched tight in her little fist. Then she set her lips, stamped her slim foot once, and ejaculated, with her cheeks burning bright: "I will never, never speak to the mean little wretch again!" "Dear me, what sad language, Miss Alene! Yet you said that by yourself, and we had no right to hear."

That night Alene astonished worthy relative who accompanied her, by asking her if she knew Mr. Raymond her command by which to communicate with him.

Baranck "No, my dear, I do not," was the reply, and with the words her last hope of ever again meeting Ogere vanished. For here she was speeding away over the Atlantic, every minute bearing her farther and farther from the man she loved, and with no means at

Might not happen in a year?
A few days before Alene sailed for the old world, Raymond Ogere' sat upon the balcony of his hotel in Paris. He had been at that city three weeks; for, after leaving Alene, he had unexpectedly found it necessary to start for France immediately, on business for Glad he was of this means of distraction from what had cast a gloom over all his prospects. Not as heretofore did he enter upon the trip with energy and interest, but to flee from bitter disappointment.

By his side sat a lady, who had done much to brighten his voyage thither, and his sojourn in Paris. This was the Counters Brittole, who had been visit ing some friends among the Ameri-

The countess was poor, and owned nothing but an owl-haunted chateau away off somewhere where she never went, but which she cherished as the sole remnant of the past glory of the. Brittole family.

Plainly the countess had expressed her admiration for the "elegant young men" of the United States, and plainly had she shown her admiration for this particular young man by her side. She was a widow, and quite her own age, to be sure; but what did such things matter, so long as people agreed and were happy? And then her position gave her such rare opportunities to advantage an ambitious man. And, unconsciously, Raymond found himself listening to this wooing, and when at parting for the night, the countess laid in his hand a tea-rose she had worn in her hair, he actually caught himself murmuring some very mellow Fifteen minutes later, as he stood alone in his chamber, he opened his therein; something fell to the floor. As he bent to find it, he saw only a dried, crinkled bunch of apple-blossoms. Yet he sat, forgetful of everything else, gazing upon it, until at last two tears fell plump upon the little dead petals. Whatever he had thought of the countess, she was now forgotten, and in her bace he saw a fresh, slim. girl. L. in while, with pink cheeks and pink flowers peeping out behind them. He had that morning decided, his business being now properly adjusted, to take a cun over to Switzerland, as the countess had said she should do. But, instead, he took up his newspaper and

Mr. Bob Willis turned. "My what?" he asked, looking as if the terror of the night had been such as to leave him prepared for anything. "Your wife.

vanity had overleaped itself, and he had not found the poor but beautiful Miss Ellerby so much in love with himself or his money-bags as with her memory of the absent. After all, in these modern days, it is refreshing to meet with a little sentiment, though there are those who are totally unprepared for it. "They must have broken off," thought

Ogere, as he finished his promenade with Alene. "Will you be my wife?" he whispered, as they sat down. And now his tone is sober enough; goodness knows! And for answer Alene turns her poor, coolish, tear-stained face, and hides it on his sleeve; for, between laughing and crying, she despairs of trusting her voice. But she does not turn upon him the look of scorn she had sent after Bob Willis, and the movement bespeaks some little interest in his companionship that is remarkably satisfactory to Raymond Ogere. "It is an ill wind that blows no one quotes Ogere; "and whether it was wind or chance that thrust our vessels together, we might, but for that accident, never have met to unravel this well-tangled skein." And alas for the Countess Brittole, with her faint proposals. what would have been her feelings could she have any two offices of this Company seen Ogere's face at this moment. A few years later and Mr. and Mrs. Ogere met her.

A story comes from rock-ribbed

Windham Co., Conn. The use of names would be unkind. It concerns a spruce young city lawyer, who led a blushing damsel as a bride from her rural New England home and returned with her to the hospitable mansion of his hospitable father-in-law to enjoy the Thanksgiving festival. He was given the post of honor at the table and called upon to carve-according to the time-honored custom. The turkey was baked pretty hard and was somewhat tough withal. The spruce young lawyer struggled. The baked bird would not vield. An enormous plum pudding stood beside the turkey platter, and was somewhat in the lawyer's way. Finally he took up the pudding-dish and placed it in his chair behind him, and then renewed his attack on the turkey with redoubled vigor. His face was red with effort and embarrassment, his glasses steamed with perspiration-but-still he struggled. At last he made a tremendous effort and succeeded-in landing the imperious bird on the other side of the table. "There," he said in despair, "now I've done it," and sat down in the pudding!-New Haven Register.
