The Misses Hetherington. But not for a week. He had lately been gone four days when he bust into the old house, stamped the dust from his boots, and made a dash for Mrs. Latimer's sitting room, taking that lady in his arms in the most summary fashion.

"I want you, my dear, for my very own!" he exclaimed, as he held his hand over her head. "Will you give yourself to me? Can you love me? Own Hetherington gave me his children, and now I want his wife."

"Come here, Rose," he commanded again, more collectedly this time, and took Daisy on his knee and drew two chairs, before the open fire, for himself and Mrs. Latimer. "I want to tell you a story. You may not quite understand it all now, but you will as you grow older. There was once a young lady who loved a man and was married to him, but he died, and she was left a widow."

"I don't think we've got a man, when we always had one, and as I said, when I was a child, 'How lovely it is!' 'And shall we call you mamma and keep you for good?' I replied Daisy.

"I don't mind calling him Jones a bit," laughed "poor mamma," kissing Rose. "I don't think it is such a dreadful name. 'But I never in my life heard of a man called Jones.' 'I don't know, but I did a long while ago,' said Rose.

Mrs. Burnett's Boy. Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, the well-known authoress, is one of these exceptions, and her charming and picturesque extends not only to her imaginative surroundings, but to her two boys. A lady who has recently paid Mrs. Burnett a long visit is the authority for the statement that they are very handsome boys, and their mother is quite aware of their beauty by keeping them dressed in a most becoming fashion. She taught them to pose in an artistic manner. If a bell rings and a visitor is announced, Mrs. Burnett turns to her boys and says, "Take your positions." Immediately the well-trained boys fall into the poses best suited to their dress and beauty.
