A boat swept over the lonely lake
Golden moonlight and silver star
A little bird sang in the green, green brake
But the nightingale mocked in the ghost afar

The day is dead, the night remains mourned
Golden moonlight and silver star!
It is dark, so dark! the fishermen groaned
But the little bird sang in the break afar

It will never be more! the nightingale sighed
Golden moonlight and silver star!
I shall never know peace! th fishermen cried
Still the little bird sang in the break afar

God watcheth above us, the little one cried
Golden moonlight and silver star!
Over the waters the glad notes rang
And the nightingale hushed its notes afar

God watcheth above us! the little one cried
Golden moonlight and silver star!
Nay, God hath homeward the nightingale sighed
He heeded us not in His heaven afar

He careth for all! the little one plead
Golden moonlight and silver star!
The lonely fishermen raised his head
"He careth for all in His heaven afar"

A young American prima donna, just arrived from Italy, tells this pleasant story. "Well," she replied, "after all my debts are paid I may have two francs and a half left." She has not seen his countship since.

A LATE EXPLANATION.

In an interview in the Boston Herald of Tuesday Frederick Kyle, manager of the late Captain Webb, gave some interesting facts concerning the great swimmer which have not before been made public. Referring to the Captain's feat of swimming the English Channel Mr. Kyle said that Webb had been repeatedly urged not to make the attempt. His father, a doctor, even took the pains to prove to him by scientific laws that he could not hope to succeed. In the face of all arguments the great swimmer stood firm. He had his secret. The manner in which it was obtained is described by Mr. Kyle as follows: "At one time Capt. Webb was in charge of a coasting vessel which sailed for Lapland. He noticed that, while he stood shivering on deck wrapped up in furs and flannel, the Laps would go out in the ice-cold water and remain there for hours. There was the secret he was after. How was it that they could stand the cold so much better than he could? He determined to learn the secret, and, pleading sickness, sent the vessel home in charge of the first officer. He lived with the people for nine months, studied their diet, their method of living, and lived as they lived. He then returned to England and remained for two years upon the east coast existing upon blubber and the skins of fish. He had learned the secret of maintaining his normal temperature and keeping the blood in the veins and arteries in nearly the same state of richness in the water. He found as others have, we are told, that the nitrogenous food was the most valuable. He then left the doctors and discovered, or at least utilized, a scientific fact. If his channel swim, which was by generally conceded at first, proved nothing but the uncertainty of the knowledge of the wise men in whom we trust when our lives are in danger, it was a gain to the world.

MAID OF THE MIST.

A Memorable Voyage—Running a Mile a Minute—A Terrific Boat Speed.

The survivor of the Maid of the Mist's trip, DeWitt Clinton McMurtry, is 36 years old. Mr. McMurtry has lived most of his life at the Falls. "It was June 28, 1860, said he, "when we made the voyage. The Maid of the Mist was built long before 1854, for she was just about eight years old when she went through the whirlpool torrent. She was built above the Suspension Bridge. Joel Robinson had charge of her as Captain, and no other man fired her except himself. There were only three persons aboard—Captain Joel Robinson, who was lashed in the wheel-house, Jones and myself. The hatches were securely fastened, and Jones and I were down there all the time.

A MORTGAGE ON THE MAID.

The Maid the Mist was 130 x 16 feet beam, a side-wheeler, with new and powerful double engines. On this occasion the ball was set to blow off at 228 pounds, and we cast off the dock on that memorable day the escaping steam hissed madly through the escape pipe."

"How did you come to make the trip?"

"It was done to evade the payment of a mortgage held by Judge Addington, Buffalo. His son and Miss DeForrest, a beautiful girl, were victims of the catarract in 1844. They were on Luna Island. He held her out and said he was going to throw her in. She slipped from his grasp, went into the water and over the Falls. He went with her, having jumped in to save her. Joel Robinson recovered Miss DeForrest's body the next morning, and young Addison's was found in a wheel of the Maid of the Mist a few days after. There was nothing on it but a book. James W. Buchanan went from Toronto to Suspension Bridge, where he purchased a farm. He was wealthy. Soon after he went there the original Maid of the Mist was condemned as unsafe. Captain Filkins, since dead, owned her. He took out the machinery, sent her adrift in midstream, and she went to pieces at the entrance to the rapids. Mr. Buchanan took it into his head to build a new Maid of the Mist, but fell short of money. Addington was then seen, and the money to buy the machinery borrowed from him.

A MORTGAGE FOR $7,000

was given on the boat, and the Judge thought he was perfectly safe. The mortgage ran for three or five years. Buchanan kept up the payment of the interest, but finally found that the boat was likely to run him. Some Toronto parties wanted a pleasure boat to run between Kingston and Prescott. They offered $25,000 for the Maid of the Mist provided she was landed at Queenston dock in Canada. Robinson came to me and explained the situation. He said: 'If we run this boat through it's worth $30 to me and $100 apiece to you and Jones.' I thought I would run the rush. He said we could get through all right if 228 pounds of steam could be maintained. Of course, as long as she ran faster than the current she would mind her helm. We had to keep very quiet about it, of course, but there were large crowds on the banks to see the passage. The current is all of 45 miles an hour, and if we could not make some headway in it we knew that nothing but an intervention of Providence could save us.

THE TERRIBLE TRIP.

The sensation after we got in the rapids was fearful. Had I been able to make the land after the first two plunges all the money in the United States would have been no object to me. The distance from our landing to the dock at Queenston, where we made land, is just five miles, and we made the distance in seven minutes and three-quarters.

STRIKING THE FIRST RAPID

When we struck the first rapid our boat leaped downward thirty feet. Then she was hauled clear out of the water. We were tossed about in the hold. Jones and I, until it seemed as if the quick succession of shocks would kill us. There was between each concussion barely time to catch a breath, and the force, even inside the closely battened freehold, was so great that I thought a dozen times that we would never live through it. Every moment I expected that the hull would be hurled on some sharp-pointed rock which would cleave her in twain and leave us.

A MILE IN TWO MINUTES.

Our course was in the centre of the stream as near as we could make it. The water there was sixty feet higher than on the sides near the banks. The bottom of the river is deepest, and the torrent flows in a cylindrical form. We got through the whirlpool rapids all right enough, but the boat sprang several leaks, severely was she wrenched, and when I got out of the firehold at Queenston the water was up to my waist. At the whirlpool her stern grounded on a rock and the current swung her around so that she shot right across the comparatively quiet waters there and then escaped the whirlpool. It happened quicker than I can tell it. The rapids are just a mile in length, and we were less than two minutes in the surf."

THE CANADIAN VICTORY.

Details of the Repository Shift at Shoeburyness—Beautiful Work Done by the Canadians.

The London Standard of the 16th inst. says: "The most popular of yesterday's contests was the fight for the Governor General of Canada's prize—a silver cup—to be presented to the team which should perform the Repository shift in "A" in the quickest time. The operation consists in dismounting a 64-pounder gun from one carriage, moving it 20 feet to the rear on rollers, then 40 feet to flank, and remounting it on another carriage. Just before eight o'clock, after a magnificent display of skill, the Canadians succeeded in winning the Governor General of Canada's prize for the special repository shift. The competition commenced at half past five, when the second and fourth detachments of the 1st Essex men came on the ground, where were assembled Colonel Strange ways, the School of Gunnery Commandant; Colonel Batty, R.A.; Major Pearse, R.A., Colonel Macdonald, of the Canadians and his next in command, Major Short. During a portion of the contest the Marquess of Londonderry was also present. All volunteers were excluded from the ground, in order to ensure perfect

FAIRNESS TO EVERYBODY CONCERNED.

The Essex men did not go very quickly, and they completed the operation in 21m. 33s. Next came the 11th and 12th detachments of the 1st Gloucestershire. Their time was bad, viz., 22m. 28½s. The first men to gain any praise from Colonel Strangways were the 2nd and 3rd detachments of the 2nd Kent, who did the work smartly in 16m. 25½s. Next came the squad that was looked upon as certain of being the winners—the Woolwich Arsenal men 3rd Kent, under the command of Sergeant Major Hewes. Dismounting the gun with remarkable celerity, they succeeded in getting it round to the second carriage and leaving it in line of fire in 5m. 38½s. Just before getting the gun into position the No. 1 called out, "Now then, some strong men here," pointing to the shot or long beam on which the gun, weighing nearly three tons, was resting. The response came immediately in the shape of a number of the team getting hold of the shot and raising it bodily, so that the gun at once

WAS INTO THE RESTORED POSITION,

amid cheers. Colonel Strangways described it as a very fine performance. It was freely predicted that it would be impossible to beat the time made by the Arsenal men, but when the Canadians paraded before the gun, under Sergeant Major Lyndon, the opinion appeared to be somewhat modified. The word of command being given, the gun as it by magic, was dismounted and ran along the sand towards the second carriage. Such was the perfection of drill that in 4m. 53s. after starting the gun was left mounted in its second position in line of fire. A cheer, again and again repeated, burst forth from the spectators, and Colonel Strangways, turning to the men said, "Sergeant Major, I am very glad to congratulate you on the splendid bit of work you have just performed. From beginning to end there was not a single fault. The quickly and safely." The Canadians then returned to camp, where they met with renewed congratulations. The other teams which competed were the 2nd Middlesex and the 1st Sussex, the former doing the shift in 7m. 30s., and the latter in 12m. 31s. With reference to the above we may remark that the operation performed was the English shift "A" as laid down by the Royal Artillery Commandant at Shoeburyness for competition. The only difference being that on the Canadian system it was not necessary to use the superabundance of shores required by the English manual. It was in fact the English system improved upon, as the time taken by the Canadians was at least one half less than the time occupied in exactly the same manoeuvre in the English way. Possibly this may lead to the English artillery adopting the Canadian way of shifting ordnance in the same way, as owing principally to the representations of the Commandant of the Canadian team two years ago, the system of mooring used in this country is now adopted by the National Artillery Association of Great Britain.

WORK WAS DONE QUIETLY,

"THE THIRST DANCE."

A Great Gathering at Edmonton—Forty-eight Hours in Motion—Stiff Torture.

(Edmonton Bulletin.)

Our correspondent gives the following interesting account of a thirst dance: "The dance commenced about sundown on Monday and was kept up until the same time on Wednesday evening. The dancers were dressed as fantastically and painted as hideously as possible, and kept gourdsome whistles between their lips, making unearthly sounds with them while dancing to the music of the drum and the central 'ho-ya' of all concerned. They were allowed to sit down when the music stopped, but as long as the drums kept going the dancers had to keep going too. They were not supposed to either eat, drink or rest otherwise than by squatting down when the drumming ceased for the 48 hours that the dance lasted. On Tuesday afternoon an Indian named Tongue Master went through the mill by allowing two wooden pins to be put through the flesh of his breast and then fastened to a rope of the centre pole. His part of the performance was to lean back and let the greater part of his weight come on the pins as he was dancing, but he found it was a more painful operation than he had calculated on and gave up. Another Indian went through the same performance on Wednesday, but with much better grace. A sham fight on Wednesday afternoon was a little exciting, as guns were fired at very close quarters, so close indeed that one of the fighters had his cap blown off by the powder from a double-barrelled shot-gun. After the sham fight, the brave men, both men and women, rubbed their experiences in killing Blackfeet, one woman saying that she had scalped a Blackfoot while yet he was alive. This statement was greeted with loud applause. We had intended to give a report of some of their speeches, but found that the language used was not altogether in polite to us desirable, or indeed necessary, for publication. Towards evening on Wednesday presents were made to the squaw by those who had been unable to continue in the dance the allotted time, or who had failed to secure themselves as they wished to. The show came to a close on Wednesday evening at sundown."
