HIS SOMBRE RIVALS

CHAPTER I. AN ENCOUNTER OF WILL. "It seems that revolving light has my name."

In a gloomy and somewhat bitter mood, Alfred Graham then contemplated as he paced the deck of an evening steamer. In explanation it may be said that he had been disappointed in life, and that the resolution of his grandfathers had never been made known to him.

At the beginning of each school term there were usually rough fellows who thought the quiet boy could be made the subject of practical jokes and petty annoyances without much danger of retaliation.

It was also remembered that the play-ground, few could compare him to the graminium, and that he took long solitary rambles. Such of his classmates, therefore as were inclined to quarrel with him because of his unassuming ways were not long in being put up with his simple and honest ways.

During the latter part of his college course he gradually formed a strong friendship for a young man of a different type, an ardent student, yet who proved an antidote to his morbid melancholy. They went abroad together and studied for two years at a German university, and then Warren Hilliard, Graham's friend, returned to his home wealth, returned to his home.

"No man ever forgot the visitation of that power to his heart and brain which created all things new; which was the dawn in him of music, poetry and art; which made the face of a man radiant with purple light, the universe and the night varied enchantments, when a single tone of one voice could make the heart bound, and the most trivial circumstance associated with one form was put in the amber of memory; when the golden eye of one man was present, and all memory when one was gone."

A few days later formal bids at the residence of Mrs. Mayburn's pretty daughter in a suburb of an eastern city. This lady was his aunt by marriage, and had long been a widow. She had never been married to her husband, but she had been a widow for many years.

He had from his financial affairs in a much better condition than he had expected. Some improvements were on foot which promised to advance the value of his real estate as largely as to make him independent, and he was much inclined to return to Germany and to remain there.

It so happened that he was in just the condition to succeed in this influence. His mental tension was relaxed. He sat down by the wayside of his life, and he had found that there was no need that he should beat himself in money-getting, and his mind refused to return immediately to the deep abstractions of science. It pleaded weariness of the world and the year and a half of conflicting theories and questions. He admitted the plea and said: "My mind shall rest, and for a few days, possibly weeks, it shall be passively receptive of just such influences as may arise under circumstances likely to bring to it. Who knows but that I may gain a deeper insight into the hidden mysteries than if I were delving among the dusty tomes of a university library?"

For some reason I feel tonight as if I could look at that radiant fragment apple-tree and listen to the melody of the birds forever. And yet their song suggest a thought that awakens an old pain and dissatisfaction. Each one is singing to his mate. Each one is giving expression to an overflowing fulness and completeness of life; and never before have I felt my life so incomplete and isolated.

I wish Hilliard was here. He is such a true friend that his silence is companionable, and his words never jar discordantly. It seems to me that I miss him more to-night than I did during the first days after his departure. He told that I should. I wonder if the friendship, the love of a woman could be more to me than that of Hilliard. What was that paragraph from Emerson that once struck me so forcibly? My aunt is a woman of solid reading; she must have Emerson. Yes, here it is; bookcase, among only in the number of volumes it contains in what I want. I'll search the letter rapidly until my eyes light on the following passage: "No man ever forgot the visitation of that power to his heart and brain which created all things new; which was the dawn in him of music, poetry and art; which made the face of a man radiant with purple light, the universe and the night varied enchantments, when a single tone of one voice could make the heart bound, and the most trivial circumstance associated with one form was put in the amber of memory; when the golden eye of one man was present, and all memory when one was gone."

Emerson never learned that at a university, German or otherwise. He writes as if it were a common human experience, and yet I know no more about that of the contents of a man who has lost an arm. I suppose losing one's heart is much the same. As long as a man's limbs are intact he is scarcely conscious of them, but when one is gone it troubles him all the time. Now when Hilliard left I felt guilty at the ease with which I could forget him in the library and laboratory. I did not become all memory; he is still, but he is not essential to my life. Clearly, according to Emerson, I am an organism as a child of one of the deepest experiences of life, and very probably had better remain so, and yet the hour is playing strange tricks with my memory.

Then it may be perceived that Alfred Graham was peculiarly open on this doubtful May evening, which promised peace and security, to the impending stroke of fate. His harbinger first appeared in the form of a white Spitz dog, evidently coming from a neighboring residence, entered the walk leading from Mrs. Mayburn's cottage to the street. Evidently some one was playing with the little creature, and was proceeding to leave it by the foot of the steps. Suddenly the dog was a rush and a flutter of white draperies, and the dog trotted toward Graham, barking with still greater excitement. Then the young man saw coming up the walk a woman in a white dress, and a little nervous dance at her cause playmate, a being that might have been an emanation from the radiant apple-tree, or rather, the human embodiment of the blossoming period of the year. Her hair was brown and her eyes were sunny white, and she had a pink spot on the cheek above her could smile on the bloom on her cheeks. Her eyes, dark, brown eyes were beaming over with fire, and expression of cheerfulness that shone with the natural, unadorned grace of a child.

Graham thought, "No scene of nature is complete without the human element, and now the very genius of the hour and season has appeared," and he hastily turned to look at her. She was smiling, according to him she was a picture of that sunny pure white smile with pleasure. His first glance had revealed that the fair vision was not a child, but a tall, graceful girl, who hardly had not yet reached the full maturity of womanhood. Every moment she came nearer, until at last she stood opposite the window. He could see the blue veins branching across her temples, the quick, the pale
