Mutual Marriage Aid Association of Canada.

HAMILTON, ONT. Incorporated 1881. HEAD OFFICE!

Unquestionably the Most Popular Institution of the day in the above Association. AND WHY? Because at comparatively small cost it makes provision for the payment on marriage of from $250 to $5,000.

UNMARRIED PERSONS OF BOTH SEXES and parents are particularly interested in the Association, and should at once look into the plan of operation. This Association has twice matured, and already paid over Twenty Thousand Dollars, $20,000 paid to benefit during the past year. Certificates exhibited. WALTER B. WARNER, Sec'y, Hamilton, Ont. During 1882 the following have been paid thereby to and among Kingston:

Miss Kingston	$1,000 00	Rev. J. W. Mitchell, Belleville	500 00
R. A. Smith, Kingston	1,000 00	W. C. Smith, Kingston	250 00

HIS SOMBRE RIVALS

Author of "Barriers Burned Away"—"Opening a Chesnut Burr"—Etc., Etc.

"Now, papa, it's too bad of you to excuse me in this style. I appeal to Mrs. Mayburn if I did not keep my flag flying so defiantly to the last that even she did not suspect me."

"Yes," said the old lady dryly; "I can testify to that."

"Which is only another proof of my penetration," chuckled the major. "Well, well, it is no seldom I can get ahead of Grace in anything that I like to make the most of my rare good fortune: and it seems, Mr. Graham, as if you and your aunt had already become a part of our present and prospective home circle. I have seen a letter in which Warren speaks of you in a way that reminds me of a friend who was shot almost at my side in a fight with the Indians. That was nearly half a century ago, and yet no one has taken his place. With men, friendships mean something, and last."

"Come, come," said Mrs. Mayburn, bristling up, "neither Grace nor I will permit such an implied slur upon our sex."

"My friendship for Hilland will last," said Graham with quiet emphasis. "Most young men are drawn together by mutual liking—by something congenial in their natures. I owe him a debt of gratitude that can never be repaid. He found me a lonely, neglected boy, who had scarcely ever known kindness, much less affection, and his ardent, generous nature became an antidote to my gloomy tendencies. From the first he has been a constant and faithful friend. He has not one unworthy trait. But there is nothing negative about him, for he abounds in the best and most manly qualities, and I think," he concluded, speaking slowly and deliberately, as if he were making an inward vow, "that I shall prove worthy of his trust and regard."

Grace looked at him earnestly and gratefully, and the thought again asserted itself that she had not yet gauged his character or his feeling towards herself. To her surprise she also noted that Mrs. Mayburn's eyes were filled with tears, but the old lady was equal to the occasion, and misled her by saying, "I feel condemned, Alford, that you should have been so lonely and neglected in early life, but I know it was so."

"Oh, well, aunt, you know I was not an interesting boy, and had I been imposed upon you in my hobbledehoy period, our present relations might never have existed. I must ask your congratulations also," he continued, turning towards the major and his daughter. "My aunt and I have in a sense adopted each other. I came hither to pay her a formal call, and have made another very dear friend."

"Have you made only one friend since you became our neighbor?" asked Grace with an accent of reproach in her voice.

"I would very gladly claim you and your father as such," he replied smilingly.

The old major arose with an alacrity quite surprising in view of his lameness, and pouring out two glasses of the wine that Jinny had brought in answer to Grace's touch of the bell, he gave one of the glasses to Graham, and with the other in his left hand, he said, "And here I pledge you the word of a soldier that I acknowledge the claim in full, not only for Hilland's sake, but your own. You have generously sought to beguile the tedium of a crotchety and irritable old man; but such as he is, he gives you his hand as a true, staunch friend; and Grace knows this means a great deal with me."

"Yes, indeed," she cried. "I believe papa you almost make me jealous. You treated Warren as if you were the great Mogul, and he but a prostrating subject. Mr. Graham, if so many new friends are not an embarrassment of riches, will you give me a little niche among them?"

"I cannot give you that which is yours already," he replied: "nor have I a little niche for you. You have become identified with Hilland you know, and therefore require a large space."

"Now, see here, my good friends, you are making too free with my own peculiar property. You are already rich in each other, not counting Mr. Hilland, who, according to Alford, seems to embody all human excellence. I have only this philosophical nephew, and even with him shall find a rival in every book he can lay hands upon. I shall therefore carry him off at once, especially as he is to be absent several days."

The major protested against his absence, and was cordiality itself in his parting words.

Grace followed them out on the moonlit piazza.

"Mr. Graham," she said hesitatingly, "you will not be absent very long, I trust."

"O no," he replied lightly: "only two or three weeks. In addition to my affairs in the city I have some business in Vermont, and while there shall follow down some well remembered trout-streams."

She turned slightly away and buried her face in a spray of roses from the bush that festooned the porch. He saw that a tinge color was in her cheeks as she said in a low tone, "You should not be absent long: I think your friend will soon visit us, and you should be here to welcome him," and she glanced hastily toward him. Was it the moonlight that made her look so very pale? His eyes told here. Mrs. Mayburn had walked slowly on, and seemingly he had forgotten her. The young girl's eyes soon fell before his fixed gaze and her face grew troubled. He started and said lightly, "I beg your pardon, Miss Grace, but you have no idea what a picture you make with the sail of those roses. The human face in clear moonlight reveals character. It is said, and I again congratulate my friend without a shadow of a doubt. Upon me as I am in such matters, I am quite satisfied that Hilland will need no other welcome than yours, and that he will be wholly content with it for some time to come. Moreover, when I find myself among the trout, there's no telling when I shall get out of the woods."

"Is fishing, then, one of your ruling passions?" the young girl asked, with an attempt to resume her old piquant style of talk with him.

"Yes," he replied laughing, as that his aunt might hear him; "but when one's passions are of so mild a type one may be excused for having a half dozen. Good-by!"

She stepped forward and held out her hand. "You have promised to be my friend," she said gently.

His hand trembled in her grasp as he said quietly and firmly, "I will keep my promise."

She looked after him wistfully as she thought, "I'm not sure about him. I hope it's only a passing disappointment, for we should not like to think that our happiness had brought him wretchedness."

CHAPTER XII.

FLIGHT TO NATURE.

Graham found his aunt waiting for him on the rustic seat beneath the apple tree. Here, a few hours before, his heart-chair with hope, he had hastened forward to meet Grace St. John. Ages seemed to have passed since that moment of bitter disappointment, teaching him how relative a thing is time.

The old lady found him without a word, and they passed on silently to the
