HIS SOMBRE RIVALS

Author of "Barriers Burned Away"—"Opening a Chestnut Burr"—Etc., Etc.

TWO BATTLES.

In less than an hour Graham was in the parlor, looking, it is true, somewhat battered, but cheerful and resolute. His friends found him installed in a great arm-chair, with his bruised foot on a cushion, his arm in a sling, and a few pieces of court plaster distributed rather promiscuously over his face and head. He greeted Hilliard and his wife so heartily, and assured the major so genially that he should now divide with them his honors as a veteran, that they were reassured, and the rather tragic mood in which they had started on the visit was dispelled.

"I must admit, though," he added to his old friend, who was also made comfortable in his chair, which Hilliard had brought over, "that in my fall on the field of glory I made a sorry figure. I was held down by my horse and trampled on as if I had been part of the sacred soil."

"Field of glory, indeed!" exclaimed Hilliard, contemptuously.

"I did not know that you had become a soldier," said Grace, with surprise.

"I was about as much of a soldier as the majority, from the generals down," was the laughing reply.

"I don't see how you could have been a worse one, if you had tried," was his friend's rejoinder. "I may do no better; but I should be less than man if I did not make an effort to wipe out the disgrace as soon as possible. No reflection on you, Graham. Your wounds exonerate you; and I know you did not get them in running away."

"Yes, I did,—two of them eighteen,—three in my arm. As to 'wiping out this disgrace as soon as possible,' I think that is a very secondary matter."

"Well? I don't understand it all," was Hilliard's almost savage answer. "But I can tell you from the start you need not enter on your old prudent counsels that I should serve the government as a stay at home quartermaster and general supply agent. In my opinion, what the government needs is men,—men who at least won't run away. I now have Grace's permission to go,—dear, brave girl!—and go I shall. To stay at home because I am rich seems to me the very snobbishness of wealth; and the kind of work I have been doing graybeards can do just as well, and better."

Graham turned a grave look of inquiry upon the wife. She answered it by saying with a pallid face, "I had better perish a thousand times than destroy Warren's self-respect."

"What right have you to preach caution," continued Hilliard, "when you went far enough to be struck by half a dozen bullets?"

"The right of retreat which scarcely slackened until I was under my aunt's roof.

"Come, Graham, you are tantalizing us," said Hilliard, impatiently. "There, forgive me, old fellow. I fear you are still a little out of your head," he added, with a slight return of his old good humor. "Do give us then, if you can, some account of your mysterious advance on Washington instead of Richmond."

"Yes, Mr. Graham," added the major, "if you are able to give me some reason for not blushing that I am a Northern man, I shall be glad to hear it."

"Mrs. Hilliard," said Graham, with a smiling glance at the young wife's face, "you have the advantage of us all. You can proudly say, 'I'm a Southerner.' Hilliard and I are neither but 'low-down Yankees.' Come, good friends, have I not been enough tragedy of late; and if I have to describe a little to-night, let us look at matters philosophically. If I received some hard knocks from your kin, Mrs. Hilliard—"

"Don't say 'Mrs. Hilliard!'" interrupted his friend. "As I've told you before, my wife is 'Grace' to you."

"So be it then. The hard knocks from your kin have materially added to my small stock of sense; and I think the entire North will be wiser as well as sadder before many days pass. We have been taught that taking Richmond and marching through the South will be no holiday picnic. Major St. John has been right from the start. We must encounter brave, determined men; and, whatever may be true of the leaders, the people are as sincere in their patriotism as we are. They don't even dream that they are fighting in a bad cause. The majority will stand up for it as stoutly and conscientiously as your husband for ours. Have I not done justice to your kin, Grace?"

"Yes," she replied, with a faint smile.

"Then forgive me if I say that until four o'clock last Sunday afternoon, and in a fair, stand-up fight between a Northern mob and a Southern mob, we whipped them."

"But I thought the men of the North prided themselves on their 'staying power,'" said Grace.

"They had no 'staying power' when they found fresh regiments and batteries pouring in on their flank and rear. I believe that retreat was then the proper thing. The wild panic that ensued was almost the logical result of the condition of the men and officers, and especially of the presence of a lot of nondescript people that came to see the thing as a spectacle, a sort of gladiatorial combat, upon which they could look at a safe distance. Two most excellent results have been attained: I don't believe we shall ever send out another mob of soldiers; and I am sure that a mob of men and women from Washington will never follow it to see the fun."

"I wish Beauregard had compelled them all,—the mob of high and low,—to remain," growled the major. "I must say, Mr. Graham, that the hard knocks you and others have received may result in infinite good. I think I take your meaning, and that we shall agree very nearly before you are through. You know that I was very bitterly opposed to the mot 'On to Richmond!' cry; and now the utmost enmity of the thing is clearly proved."

"I agree with you that it was all wrong,—that it involves risks that never should have been taken at this stage of the war; and I am told that General Scott and other veterans disapproved of the measure. Nevertheless, it came wonderfully near being successful. We should have gained the battle if the attack had been made earlier, or if that old mule, Patterson, had done his duty."

"If you are not too tired, give us the whole movement, just as you saw it," said Hilliard, his eyes glowing with excitement.

"Oh, I feel well enough for another retreat to-night. My trouble was chiefly fatigue and lack of sleep."

"Because you make light of wounds, we do not," said Grace.

"Hilliard knows that the loss of a little blood, as pale and watery as mine would be of small account," was Graham's laughing response.

"Well, to begin at the beginning, I followed Patterson till convinced that his chief impulse was to get away from the enemy. I then returned to Washington only to learn that McDowell had a heavy skirmish which was not particularly to our advantage. This was enough for me, and the impression was that a general movement would be made the next day. The fact that my regiment had won with little opposition may be counted a false omen, I did not care to ask my pet lieutenant, Stephens, too many questions, lest I, my lieutenant, Frederick, or your humble servant, should be ordered to get another mount, but could not obtain one for love or money. Every beast and conveyance in the city seemed already engaged for the coming spectacle. The majority of these civilians did not leave till early on Sunday morning, but I had plenty of company on Saturday, when, with my good horse, I went in a rather leisurely way to Centreville; for as a correspondent I had fairly accurate information of what was taking place, and had heard that there would be no battle that day.

"I reached Centreville late in the evening, and soon learned that the forward movement would take place in the night. Having put my horse in thorough condition for the morrow, and made an enormous supper through the hospitality of some staff officers, I sought a quiet knoll in which to sleep in soldier fashion under the sky, but found the scene too novel and beautiful for such prosaic oblivion. I was on the highest ground I could find, and beneath and on either side of me were the campfires of an army. Around the nearest of these could be seen the forms of the soldiers in every picturesque attitude; some still cooking and making their rude suppers, others executing double-shuffles like war-dances, more discussing earnestly and excitedly the prospects of the coming day, and not a few looking pensively into the flames as if they saw pictures of the home and friends they might never see again. In the main, however, animation and jollity prevailed; and from far and near came the sound of song and laughter, and chaffing. Far down the long slope towards the dark, wooded valley of Bull Run, the light of the fires shaded off into such obscurity as the full moon permitted, while beyond the stream in the far distance a long, irregular line of luminous haze marked the encampments of the enemy.

"As the night advanced the army grew quiet; near and distant sounds died away; the canvas tents were like mounds of snow; and by the flickering, dying flames were multitudes of quiet forms. At midnight few scenes could be more calm and beautiful, so tenderly did the light of the moon soften and etherealize everything. Even the parked artillery lost much of its grim aspect, and all nature seemed to breathe peace and rest.

"It was rumored that McDowell wished to make part of the march in the evening, and it would have been well if he had done so. A little past midnight a general stir and bustle ran through the sleeping army. Figures were seen moving hurriedly, men forming into lines, and there was a general movement. But there was no promptness in action. The soldiers stood around, sat down, and at last lay on their arms and slept again. Mounting my horse, with saddle-bags well stuffed with such rations as I could obtain, I sought the centres of information.

"It appears that the division under General Tyler was too slow in starting, and blocked the march of the Second and Third Divisions. As I picked my way around, only a horse's sagacity kept me from crushing some sleeping fellow's leg or arm, for a horse won't step on a man unless excited.

"Well, Tyler's men got out of the way at last in a hap-hazard fashion, and the Second and Third Divisions were steadily moving, but hours behind time. Such marching! It reminded one of countrymen streaming along a road to a Fourth of July celebration.

"My main policy was to keep near the commander-in-chief, for then I hoped to obtain from the staff some idea of the plan of battle and where its brunt would fall. I confess that I was disgusted at first, for the general was said to be ill, and followed his columns in a carriage. It seemed an odd way of leading an army. But he came out all right; and he did his duty as a soldier and a general, although everyone is cursing him to-day. He was the first man on the real battle field, and by no means the first to leave it.

"Of course I came and went along the line of march, or of straggling rather, as I pleased; but I kept my eye on the general and his staff. I soon observed what he decided to make his headquarters at the point where a road leading from the great Warrenton Turnpike passed to the north through what is known as the 'Big Woods.' Tyler's command continued westward down the turnpike to what is known as the Stone Bridge, a single substantial arch at which the enemy were said to be in force. It was now clear that the first fighting would be there, and that it was McDowell's plan to send his main force under Hunter and Heintzelman farther north through the woods to cross at some point above. I therefore followed Tyler's column, as that must soon become engaged.

"The movements had all been so mortally slow that any chance for surprise was lost. As we approached the bridge it was as lovely a summer morning as you would wish to see. I had ridden ahead with the scouts. Thrushes, robins, and other birds were singing in the trees. Startled rabbits, and a mother-bird with a brood of quails, scurried across the road, and all seemed as still and peaceful as any Sunday that ever dawned on the scene. It was hard to persuade one's self that in front and rear were the forces of deadly war.

"We soon reached an eminence from which we saw what dispelled at once the allusion of sylvan solitude. The sun had been shining an hour or two, and the bridge before us and the road beyond were defended by abatis and other obstructions. On the farther bank a line of infantry was in full view with batteries in position prepared to receive us. I confess it sent a thrill through every nerve when I first saw the ranks of the foe we must encounter in no mere pageant of war.

"In a few moments our forces came up, and at first one brigade deployed on the left and another on the right of the pike. At last I witnessed a scene that had the aspect of war. A great thirty-pound Parrott gun unlimbered in the centre of the pike, and looked like a surly mastiff. In a moment an officer, who understood his business, sighted it. There was a flash, bright even in the July sunlight, a grand report awakening the first echoes of a battle whose thunder was heard even in Washington; and a second later we saw the shell explode directly over the line of Confederate infantry. Their ranks broke and melted away as if by magic."
