author of "Barriers Barred Away" - "Opening a Chaucer Barr" - etc., etc.

"Hilland" shouted Graham, in a voice that drowned the others' words.

There was no answer, and the fugitives were nearly all in.

Graham galloped out beyond the last lagging trooper, and with a cry he was shouting, "Hilland!"

At that moment he returned and rode among Hilland's command.

He now rode to where the two columns were standing, and the senior began rapidly, "Major Graham, you sympathize with me deeply."

"You are a soldier and that Hilland was one too. We've had to discount such experiences from the start."

"Gentlemen," said Graham, in a low, concentrated voice, and touching his hat to the two columns, "I am under the command of you both."

"I forbid it," they both cried simultaneously, while the senior officer continued, "Graham, you are leaving your duty to me."

"I would be glad to see you go back. I would certainly remain in your camp, while there is not one chance in a thousand that you could do Hilland any good."

Graham made no immediate reply, but was studying the ill-omened grove with his glass.

"I do not think there will be any further pursuit. The enemy are retreating from the grove."
