With keen-edged soythe to cut the harvest down. He swung his blade with gaunt and shrivelled hand, Still marked his cruel prowess with their tears.

A noble flower stood in his path of gloom, A flower that lent its odour to the air ; And friends stood round it to avert its doom, With loving hearts, strong with the breath of prayer. Till the full measure of its worth is scaled.

The great and good first perish from his way. In sacred pealm the Christian takes his part, The weeping choir stand near in sad array; A few short hours with hope and doubting tossed, Then death has conquered, and our friend is lost. Not lost! oh, death, thy stroke was cold and keen. Thy worst is done, our friend is lying low Stand back, dread shade, there is a light between,

In vain, no mercy warms death's icy heart,

Our friend and thee which evermore shall glow.
