There have long been signs that the end of the inflation was near, and that a vernment, and it was taken for granted that they were not unwilling to have the elections over before the tide turned and so dissolved the House a year be ald, in justifying his course in precip Lennox, for which he is a candidate.

"Sir, the progress of our manufactur ing interests has been surprising. The new industries that have been started are in their number wondering. But they would be quadrupled if it were not for the uncertainty as so whether the policy of 1878 will be continued for the my own knowledge, and I may say we capitalists in Europe, in England. States, saying they are quite ready to in opening new industries and develop (ing old ones. But they add, "How are we to know that this policy is going The leaders of the Opposition state that the moment they come in have no certainty but that so soon as we have our factories built, our machinery in operation, and our hundreds of thousands of dollars invested, the free traders will be elected, the policy of protection will be reversed, and our capital will be lost." As a result of such representations as these, we came to the conclusion that the country, having had an experience of three years of protection, should now have an opportunity of say. ing whether the system of festering our industries should be continued or not. So, here we are now, appealing to the

It will be seen that Sir John Macdon ald gives no expression to anticipations of any check to the present inflation. He does not, so far as we can judge from his words, believe that there is any need for caution. If the national policy is sustained, there will be more manufactories, and more capital invested in that way. He believes, apparently, that the more capital that is invested the more profitable manufactories will be, and the better it will be for the country. He does not say anything about our limited market, and the danger of overdoing manufactures. He declares, on the contrary, that he brought on the elections in order that capitalists, being assured that the protective policy was going to be maintained, might be induced to invest more money in manufacturing than before. Our manufactories might be quadrupled, he thinks. Now. Mr. Smithers is of an altogether different opinion. He believes that the busi ness expaision is so great that it cannot go ou at the same rate much longer. He declares "that trade is not in an al. together satisfactory condition," and "that manufactures are being or are likely to be overdone." Here is what Mr. Smithers says, and a comparison of its tone with that of Sir John's speech is

The result proved it, for the banks did not get back to see a limits without pass. ing through a very severe ordeal, which or rwhelme some of them, seriously crippled objers, and damaged all to a gre ter or less degree; and in calling attention to the much larger figures which have now been reached, I do not wish to be considered an alarmist; but to say the least the figures are somewhat startling. I am quite sensible that the con attons of the country have greatly change i, and we can perhaps carry a heavier load now, still it is the part of wisdom to look the matter squarely in the face. I do not say that I see trouble in the future, but it is well that we should be on the lookout and be prepared if it does come. It is quite certain that we-that is the banks generally-cannot go on expanding at this rate much longer, and the sooner we much depends upon the crops, about which there is, of course, considerable uncertainty. I do not wish to make ments, but I think it is an undeniable fact that trade is not in an altogether very general that profits are light, and it is pretty well understood that con. siderable stocks of merchandise have or are likely to be, overdone, at least in most reliable source, that there are 18 pacity, and others are doing so.
