MY REPOSE.

I know an orchard small and fair, All rich and sweet with blossoms rare, Where, in the shadows 'neath the trees. The soft green grass waves in the breeze, And buttercups all swaying light,

Laugh to the wind flowers pure and white. The bluebirds keep their holiday, All singing, singing, loud and clear, Till laughing children pause to hear, And, listening to them, half forget

To pluck the dewy violet.

Beneath the trees the passing feet Have worn a footway wild and sweet, All edged with flowers and velvet moss, Where ferns and grasses trail across, And apple bleoms floot through the air,

Te hide the earth so brown and bare. There on a long-past April day, I sat and dreamed the hours away, The springing grass about my feet. Was starred with daisies fresh and sweet, Into my heart the spring time crept,

And care and pain that morning slept. And ever since where'er I go, feel that soft breeze round me blow . Loud in my heart the bluebirds sing, And flowers are round me blossoming So that no storm of woe or pain, Can beat upon my heart again

It was all very well that he pretended to study Latin and Greek while he spent the summer with Aunt Mab; he was far passed between the high bedges that more likely to take a double first-class in boating or cricketing, or become a senior wrangler with a fishing rod, than to excel in any purely mental straggle. As for myself, I was a young Londoner on a fortnight's visit to Aunt Mab. had already spent ten idle days, wandirection of the dairy-maid, and perpetually squabbing with Cousin Tom. An hour had past, my fingers grew tired, and my head heavy. Had Tom been anyone but Tom I should have almost regretted of his offer of lawntennis. Lawn-tennis! the very word was refreshing, and suggested pleasant pastime and good fellowship. I left the piano and turned to the open window , the garden was cool and green, the room was close and decidedly dreary. Finally sallied forth. I had not gone a dozen vards before I came upon Tom, partly asleep, his legs and arms stretched over a half dozen chairs, two Latin books and a big dictionary lying on the gravel path, and the last number of Punch

Five minutes after had given the erder there came a knock at the door, and Tom walked in.

"You are ilt," he said abruptly. "Not at all." What is the matter then?

"May I not wish to be alone?" "Oh, certainly." As red as fire, Tom retraced his steps but, equally suddenly, he changed his
