A DUPLICATED ACCEPTANCE. Young Selvide came of a father who had always looked out for himself most unselfishly. He had been living in a poverty-stricken village, left his son little but good advice when he died. His advice was to get on by repetition what he lacked in quantity. It was simply this: "It is easier to marry money than to earn it."

Arrived at New York, Selvide did not make haste to go into business, for his capital, now about $4,000, was too small to enable him to buy an interest in any firm strong enough to give him the respect he craved. He was in the good time Selvide assured himself more and more sooner of later. On the other hand, he could afford to live well and keep up appearances; and as any well dressed and well educated man would be sure to find a way into some New York set, Selvide soon found himself in a grade of society where all the gentlemen were dress coats when making evening calls.

He had almost made up his mind to change his base of operations and go to New York, which the two or three thousand dollars realized from the sale of his father's property would enable him to do in a fair way, when an unexpected check from the owner of the Pumpville place, his father's only daughter, who thanks to the laziness, luxury and indulgence peculiar to the families of such men who are rather coarse grained vulgar, changed in a single moment his mind.

While he was not neglecting any promising opportunities to pick up some fortune that might be had before marriage, he went West to look at a mining adventure that promised well, and some letters that were forwarded to him would say, as he was returning, that he was greatly astonished and disappointed to find that Florence and her mother had left the boarding house in the house which they had lived, and no one in the house could tell where they had gone.

There were no young men in the vicinity whom her father would have allowed to visit her, even had he realized that fifteen years a girl may be sought for more than a child. Miss Perris, therefore, thrown upon herself for all her diversions, and she sometimes grew desperate over her inability to use up her time.

Naturally Selvide was impatient, but he would also discreetly, and he did not prostrate the prospects by undue haste. One day, however, when Miss Perris was aimlessly looking some goods that she had been looking at the mixed market in rearranging them, Selvide fastened to assist her, and when his hand met hers under the folds of the material he did not resist the temptation to mingle in a little squeeze. As the hand was warm and soft, and the other showed no inclination to withdraw it, Selvide continued to hold it. Suddenly, after a quick glance at the door, he withdrew it and kissed it. Kate gave him a shy look, without a bit of reproach in it, and under her upper lip, and this so emboldened him that he leaned across the counter and kissed the young lady's cheek.
