REV. DR. NULTY IN IRELAND.

A Vigorous Speech in Favor of the Land League Agitation.

On the 8th February last, a banquet was given in the hall of St. Mary's College, Mullingar, in honour of the of the Most Rev. Dr. Nulty, Bishop of Meath, on the occasion of his return from Rome. There was a large attendance both of the clergy and leading laymen of the diocese. The health of his Lordship having been proposed and honoured with the utmost enthusiasm,

Dr. Nulty, was most warmly received, and expressed his acknowledgments for the honour, the highest that could be conferred upon him. Alluding to his recent visit to Rome, the Bishop spoke of the kindness with which the Irish Bishops and he himself had been received by the Holy Father. His Holiness did not disapprove of the just, lawful, and peaceable agitation for the regeneration of their country's rights. On the contrary His Holiness had expressed the strongest possible desire, and had almost given expression to a prayer that they would be successful in the recovery of their rights. (Applause.) The Holy Father added that, looking to the north and south, to the left and the right, he saw portions of his Church which gave him great anxiety and trouble; but of all the world there was not one spot to which he looked with so much affection, happiness and comfort as to their own dear freeland. (Applause.) He deprecated and condemned, no doubt, any excesses that might accompany the agitation—every good man did so—but they were not responsible, neither was the agitation. (Applause.) He assured his Holiness, and he had been assured by others, there was nothing they detested, abhorred, and deprecated more than these disgraceful outrages that had brought ruin and shame on the country. Now, referring to what he had in a humble way done to raise his voice against the oppression, against the men who caused misery, pain and sorrow to our poor people in this country, he could only say that he had done so, and he would do so again. (Applause.) He never would stand by and look with complacency or even patience at the ruin and desolation that landlords had brought upon this part of the country. He had been summoned to the late State trials as a witness, and was prepared to give testimony to the facts that he had seen with his own eyes. He had seen seven hundred people turned adrift on the wide world in one day; or rather in two—for it took two days. He had seen their homes levelled to the ground and demolished, while not a single person inside those houses owed one farthing's rent but one, and that one went round and encouraged the others not to pay their rents. But they did pay them, and he saw the "crowbar brigade" levelling the houses of honest men to the ground—houses that sheltered seven hundred human beings. He saw them come to one place where there were in two houses fever-stricken victims, and the crowbar brigade refused to take them down. Death was very busy there, and they were afraid of catching the disease. But the exterminators were determined to carry out their work. They put a winnowing sheet over those poor sick girls, took the roof from the house, and the exterminator told them to do it carefully, "for," said he, "I hate the trouble of coroners' inquests." (Hisses.) The house was was levelled, and the next day His Lordship attended these girls and administered the last rites of the church to them whilst there was no covering over their heads but the canopy of heaven. He saw the police officers, strong, rough men, blubbering like children at the sights of horror that met their eyes. The poor girls—it was in September, with equinoctial gales blowing, saturated with wet, and with streaks of soot upon their famished faces—presented with the whole scene the saddest and most awful spectacle of suffering humanity he had ever witnessed. He remembered one instance where a man came forward and offered to pay eight years' rent in advance if he would be allowed to remain in his little home, but was refused. They had three great facts before the country—facts of exceptional magnitude and importance. First of all was the Land League agitation. (Applause.) In the next place, the prospects of a comprehensive measure of justice in the future to the tenants, and further the certainty of Coercion. (Groans.) Now, as to the Coercion Bill, which in the present instance was called by a nice name, but which was really the most atrocious, cruel and unnecessary Coercion Bill ever presented, he regretted exceedingly that the Government had thought fit to bring in this bill at all, but he regretted particularly that they had thought fit to do so before they knew anything about the Land Bill. As to this Coercion Bill, he objected to it as strongly as man could do—in the first place, because it was the most comprehensive, despotic and arbitrary Coercion Bill that had been passed for this country for fifty years, especially in its retrospective clauses. (Hear, hear.) It was such an unwarrantable interference with their liberty, freedom and rights that no man of sense could do otherwise than object to it. The Chief Secretary and the Lord Lieutenant were the nominal executive under this bill, but the real parties who would carry its provisions into effect were the magistrates of every county, by whom the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary would, of course, be guided. There were, no doubt, many very upright and honest men amongst the magistracy, but, as a rule, the sympathies of the magistrates of Westmeath were not with the liberties of the people. (Applause.) The magistrates of the present time were in anything but good humor with the people, for they were to a great degree connected with the land, and believed in the aristocracy and landocracy of the country. He thought the Coercion Act was directly levelled at the land agitation. They would try to inspire terror into all the people connected with it, and if the agitation were maintained by men of courage and constancy they would stamp it out altogether. (Applause.) The Bishop then alluded to the large number of meetings that had been suppressed without just cause, and spoke especially of the Drogheda meeting. The object of the Government clearly was the suppression of the land agitation, to put down the expression of public grievances, and stifle public opinion. If that object should succeed, what would be the result. They would not stifle the agitation of the Land League (cheers)—but they would convert the open agitation of the Land League into a secret agitation. (Cheers.) They would, he was afraid, convert these local branches into secret societies, and the whole country would be covered with secret societies—with Fenianism and Ribbonism—the country would become ungovernable, and the landlords themselves would have to run for their lives. (Applause.) The Bishop expressed his opinion that had the Government been disposed to take it there never was so good an opportunity in the history of this country for the introduction of a good land bill. He referred to the Bessborough Land Commission as showing how public opinion had forced the justice of the tenants' cause upon even those who might be supposed to be adverse to their claims. The Land League orators had by their exertions created a golden opportunity by which Gladstone's Government could cover themselves with imperishable glory. Instead of that they had inundated the country with police and military. If even now Mr. Gladstone would bring in a good land bill, which in Logue he would establishing the principles of the three Fs with peasant proprietary as quickly as practicable, the 600,000 tenant farmers in Ireland would become the most loyal and efficient troops her Majesty would have in this country, happiness and prosperity would reign, outrages would vanish, and there would be no more peaceable country in the world. (Hear) He believed the English people were as fair and just as any on the face of the globe, and when the panic which now prevailed passed away, the English people, and particularly the Radicals, would be believed, rally round them. (Applause). He hoped that a land bill satisfactory to the people, would be passed, and if so this country would be one of the most flourishing in the British Empire, and he hoped its temporal prosperity would be in some sense equal to its spiritual prosperity, for as to the morals and purity of their people and their religious fervour he but re-echoed the sentiments of the Holy Father in saying that there was no people superior to the Irish people known. (Applause).
