VOL. L. KINGSTON, CANADA, FRIDAY, APRIL 8, 1881. NO. 83

A PUZZLED CENSUS MAN

A Kingston census man with a large book dreamily approached a house in which a respectable Dutchman lived yesterday afternoon. Drawing the pen from behind his ear with a graceful motion, he put the question:

"Got any boys?" the marshal said
To a lady from over the Rhine,
And the lady shook her flaxen head
And civilly answered, 'Nine.'

"Got any girls," the marshal said
To the lady from over the Rhine,
As again the lady shook her head
And civilly answered, 'Nine.'

"But some are dead," the marshal said
To the lady from over the Rhine,
And again the lady shook her head
And civilly answered, 'Nine.'

"Husband of course," the marshal said
To the lady from over the Rhine,
And again she shook her flaxen head
And civilly answered, 'Nine.'

"The d—l you have!" the marshal said
To the lady from over the Rhine,
And again she shook her flaxen head
And civilly answered, 'Nine.'

"Now what do you mean by shaking your head always answering 'Nine'?"
"Ich kann kein Englisch," civilly said,
The lady from over the Rhine.

It is needless to say that the census man fled. The episode so worked in his mind that he delivered himself of the above poem during his dreams last evening.

CONCLUDING CEREMONY.

A Pleasing Reminiscence—Excellent Speeches—Relief From Duty, etc.

We doubt if St. Mary's Cathedral could have been more crowded than it was yesterday, when both standing and sitting room was fully occupied. The members of St. Vincent de Paul Society, as ushers, acted with a courtesy and activity that merited the compliments of everybody. Though every effort was made to keep the crowd back the pews were quickly filled, and by the time the clerical party entered the edifice was filled to overflowing with anxious spectators. The delegates from a distance were given all the prominence and attention possible under the circumstances.

BRILLIANT EVENING SPEECH.

His Lordship did not reply to the address of his clergy in the cathedral, reserving his remarks until the evening, when, after dinner he made, 'tis said, a brilliant speech. The bishop certainly speaks without effort, his language being terse and expressive and his delivery decidedly eloquent.

THE CHIEF ATTRACTION.

The address of the people was that in which most interest centred. When it was announced, and Dr. Cleary signified his desire to hear it, Dr. Sullivan, Messrs. J. Meagher, W. Power, M. Morrison, D. Donoghue, D. R. Murphy, Trenton, and D. Macauley and Joseph Redmond, Picton, formed in a semi-circle before the bishop, and the first named, before reading the address, intimated that the occasion had a double significance, that that day was the festival of St. Celestine, the pope who had sent St. Patrick to Ireland, and surely history was in some extent repeating itself after a period of 1,500 years in the sending of the bishop to the descendants mainly of those whom St. Patrick served to christianize. He could well understand the doubt and uncertainty which filled the mind of St. Patrick in setting out upon his mission, but his lordship would, he felt sure, have none of those doubts and uncertainties, because he already held a high place in the love and affection of the people. The sentiments not only of the city, but of the whole diocese, were conveyed in the address. He proceeded in a clear, ringing voice to read the message of the people.

A PUNGENT REPLY.

The bishop listened attentively. At the close of its recitation he blessed the committee, and then entering the pulpit made a reply of which we have appended a fair summary. Fatigued though the speaker was he gave an address remarkable for its vigor, fluency and point.

He commenced by saying that the address, of which this the (the manuscript) was a copy, and which had been read to me so feelingly and vigorously by Dr. Sullivan, had been presented to him in the name, not of the city of Kingston, but of the entire Catholic community of the diocese. He accepted it most thankfully; it gave him intense pleasure. He was happy to be among them, and he felt the sincerity of the sentiments uttered to him. As regards the welcome given to him on the streets and church it was another evidence of the true hearted loyalty with which they received their bishop. For the last six months he had yearned to see this day and to rest his eyes upon the people whom God had given into his charge, whose spiritual interests he had taken into his safe keeping, to whose welfare he would devote all the energy of his soul, looking to God for the success of his mission in the way of piety, holiness, justice and peace. The welcome of that day was a consolation to him, for the wounds his heart received by his separation from the people to whom he had been bound by the ties of nature as well as grace. They loved him, and he loved them; they had worked together harmoniously, and God had blessed them in their mutual co-operation. He was consoled; he was like the mother after pains of labour, he rejoiced in having a new field, a new flock, a new family in God. He was now their pastor, their spiritual father. He had felt apprehensive in coming among a strange people. In a geographical and secular sense he was stranger, but he knew they were a Catholic people, they were a people of

GREAT AND GOOD WORKS,

they had been tried and not found wanting, they made the sacrifices demanded of them, and in coming among them he felt that he would meet a people similar to those; he mingled with before. He could work well with his new flock in Kingston. To his late parishioners he owed and would give, till his latest breath affectionate remembrance, a daily prayer for the interest of the Catholic land from which he came, he would pray to God to fulfill the wish with which the address terminated, that distress might be converted into abundance, and that peace and harmony might prevail. He hoped Ireland would get a constitution similar to that of Canada, where the people held the bonds of freedom, the safe guards of social life, in their own hands making their own laws by which the rights of citizens are defined and developed, and he prayed that God might give to the Irish people something similar whereby they may have a voice in their own legislation by which sorrow and misery to-day might be turned into peace and joy in the future. Outside of this daily prayer for his former people, however, from that day forward he was the Bishop of Kingston; from that forward his thoughts, energies, aspirations, efforts and calculations would be for Kingston and Kingston interests paramount to all other. His spiritual interests claimed his attention first, and it would be his duty to see that all the means of grace were supplied to them abundantly, that

VIRTUE SHOULD BE ENCOURAGED

and fostered and developed, that the seeds of faith and holiness should be planted in the minds of the children, so that when it pleased God to call him away he could lay his hand upon his heart and say, "My work I have done, I have fulfilled my mission, I have preserved the faith, I have fought the good fight, according to my power, and as occasion demanded, I have sown the seed, and I hope that whether in my life time or in that of my successor, the fruit may be abundantly reaped in the diocese for the glory to God on high and peace on earth to men of good will." Not only spiritually would he be an adviser, but in social questions if his his word had any weight, if his counsels could have any guidance, they would always find him their devoted servant and faithful friend. He came to Kingston with a commission similar to that of the apostles who were sent north, south, east and west, without friends, without political alliance, without worldly interests and treasures, but solely with the cross of Christ, to preach the gospel to every creature, rich and poor, strong and weak, learned and unlearned, Jew and Pagan, every creature on the face of the earth. The word of God came to him from the Vicar of Christ from Him who had said, "Whatsoever is bound on earth shall be bound in heaven; whatsoever is loosed on earth shall be loosed in heaven." When he was called by the Vicar of Christ from where he had been working and sent to a new people he took the command "Go" as firmly as if it were the

WORD OF GOD SPOKEN VIVIDLY TO HIM,

and it was the conviction of his heart that God was with him. By nature was weak, he had no reason to feel confident in himself; no one could tell him of his infirmities better than his own conscience, but it was not upon human strength that he relied for success. In the affairs of this worldly life, in the ordinary course of nature, each ones disposition to choose for himself would be considered, each would be expected to look for place whereby he could establish a family and provide for them; but in the supernatural order of things nature counted for nothing, and grace counted for everything. Once Jesus Christ had said to the apostles, lest they should think that any success attending their efforts should be the result of their own knowledge and prudence, "Ye have not chosen me; I have chosen you." Having sketched, briefly but vividly, the nature of the apostles' work on earth, he alluded to the fact that poets, painters, sculptors, warriors, legislators and others were overlooked, and that those selected by Christ for his special work were poor fishermen to whom he addressed the words, as he met them on the sea shore, "Come with me and I will make you fishers of men." Passing a certain vineyard Christ saw a man basking indolently under the shade of his fig tree, and calling him he sent him forth to do work of universal activity, to go from nation to nation to stir up the world, to stand persecutions in the bringing of souls to God in the name of Jesus Christ. Again, Christ, in passing through a street, noticed a man in his counting house. He belonged to a class of grasping men, money changers, and was calculating his usurious profits notoriously hard towards the poor. Christ said, "Follow me." He, too, was sent forth to preach the gospel, of voluntary poverty, and the maxim of Christ, "It is better to give than to receive." Again, a learned man, a bigot, a zealot, on his way to Damascus, surrounded by soldiers seeking christians to bind them and put them to death, was, in his breathings of fury and slaughter, spoken to by a voice from heaven, saying, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" He was made an apostle and vessel of election, and to go before princes and nations, converting the people. The reason of God's selecting these men for His service was that His ways were not the ways of men, that the principles which govern the world are not the principles which rule in the sphere of Jesus Christ, that in the selection of men for christian work it was not the world's calculations that were considered, for God used instruments which the world condemned. He believed that the same voice that appealed to Saul rang in his heart, therefore was he strong and hopeful, having no apprehension in regard to his people's co-operation; he felt that if he discharged his duty God would bless his labour and cause it to fructify. Why should he not be happy, when he had received such a hearty welcome, when they had gathered around him and gave him their hearty salutations? Was such not a rich testimony of their faith? It was an expression of their faith, because he represented the and the mission of the Catholic church and the power vested in Jesus Christ, His Vicar. He was glad to see so many gathered from various portions of this extensive diocese, at great inconvenience, and to meet a stranger. When placed upon the throne by the venerable Archbishop, who gave his salutation, and when the clergy paid their allegiance, kissing his hand and cheerfully acknowledging obedience to him, should he not feel happy, and rejoice with the rejoicing of the apostles? Was it not a guarantee that all were of the one mind? He referred to the presence of the representatives of the hierarchy from other parts of this creed and the neighbouring provinces, to the welcome they extended to him, to the manner in which they had embraced him and given him the kiss of peace, to the giving to him of a seat on the episcopal bench, sharing with him their con-laid his hands upon his head, and invoked the Holy Spirit to come upon him filling his heart with holy aspirations and fitting him for the diocese of Kingston. He told the Holy Father that he was going among strangers, the face of not one, of whom he had seen, whereupon the Pope, in a paternal affectionate way stroked his cheek and said, "Have good courage; you are going among people you will like; you will find them faithful and loving." The Sovereign Pontiff's late prophecy had begun to be verified that day. They had shown him a genuine and sincere welcome. He thanked them for it; he would love them the more for it. He concluded as he began by stating that he would be to them a father and a pastor; that they would have the first claim upon his affections. He was the bishop of Kingston, and they were his people. He then solemnly adjured the Blessed Virgin Mary of the Immaculate Conception, under whose name and protection this cathedral church was dedicated to God's honour, to look down propitiously upon the Bishops and clergy and people of Kingston in that solemn hour, to whisper in their behalf to her divine Son at whose right hand she is seated in glory, to obtain from him the plentiful effusion of his spirit of wisdom and understanding and counsel and fortitude and knowledge and piety the fear of the Lord; that the good work began to-day in his name and under her patronage may progress and be brought to perfection for the advancement of religion in this diocese, for God's honour and salvation of souls and the peace and good order of society. He promised in sight of all the people that promotion of piety and devotion to the Blessed Mother of God would be one of his constant aims, being assured that this is a pledge of heaven's protection as well, to the diocese generally as to individuals and families. During the pathetic utterance of this fervent adjuration the whole congregation were deeply moved and simultaneously fell upon their knees to join the bishop's prayer to the Mother of God.

The Land League address was printed yesterday with the others, but it was not read. It was not a part of the pre-arranged programme, and the hour being late the formality of presenting it was dispensed with.

CLOSING PROCEEDINGS.

Following the addresses the bishop gave the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, and then the rain, whose nearness was indicated by mist as the procession passed through the city, having commenced to fall quite heavily the return was made to the palace via the cathedral vestry. 'Twas well that the drizzle, for it was only such, did not set in until the events of the day were about over. Later in the evening the weather cleared and the moon shone clearly, but his lordship did not leave the palace, rather he retired at an early hour to seek that rest and repose of which he was in so much need.

TWO EFFICIENT COADJUTORS.

The arrival of the bishop, and the entrance upon his episcopal duties, have removed the Administrator and Chancellor, Vicar General Farrelly and Rev. Father Twohey, of responsibilities which have pressed heavily upon them, because added to their ordinary cares and duties. The labours of both are fully appreciated by those whose appreciation is the most desirable reward.

TWO PUBLIC LEVEES.

This afternoon the bishop held a reception, many calling upon him, and to-morrow afternoon another levee will be held. Evidently Dr. Cleary desires to make the acquaintance of those among whom he has to mingle as soon as possible.

Messrs. P. Lynch, D. Murphy, and R. Costello, Belleville, were prominent representatives of the Belleville people present at the reception.

SCENE AT BELLEVILLE.

(Intelligencer.)

When quiet was obtained His Lordship was conducted to the car. At sight of him the men in the crowd set up a cheer. The air, however, was too keen for the bishop, who had been in the warm close car for several hours, and he went back for his cloak. Wrapping it round him he returned and stood in full view of the people, with the portly form of Archbishop Lynch behind him—the little bits of purple silk on the heads of the two dignataries glancing in the bright rays of the sun and contrasting oddly with their vestments of solemn black. The hurrahs having died away His Lordship addressed the assembled crowd in a clear resonant voice, and with a rich Irish accent. His Lordship began to pronounce the Benedictio. The Archbishop leaned over and suggested that he should sing it in order that it may be better heard. Then Dr. Cleary raised his hands and began that solemn and touching chant. At the first note the people fell upon their knees, and remained in that reverent attitude while the bishop, with arms extended towards them, gave them his benediction. The other priests who stood near joined in the chant, and the effect was impressive and touching in the extreme.

SERVICE AT TORONTO.

Last (Wednesday) evening pontifical vespers were celebrated in St. Michael's Cathedral in honor of the presence of Very Rev. Dr. Cleary, recently appointed Bishop of Kingston. The large building was literally crowded to the doors by representatives from all the Catholic parishes of the city. The holy altar was splendid with light, and was surmounted by a plain cross in fire, and towards the close of the service the emeralds from which it springs were illuminated. The benediction of the most blessed sacrament was celebrated by Dr. Cleary, at which the choir rendered the "O Salutaris" Gregorian, and "Tantum Ergo," by Lambellotte. At the close Dr. Cleary, who is a fluent speaker, came forward and in a few graceful sentences expressed his pleasure at being present with them. He remarked that he found the Catholic faith flourishing wherever he went, and exhorted his hearers to be steadfast in that faith. The congregation kneeling, the rev. bishop gave them his blessing.
