I -Her husband was horribly jea'ous, though he had no reason to be so. had one evening stopped to tea at a friend's house, and there was no male member of the family to see her home, and her friend was ill. Nothing for it, therefore, but to make her way home

II .- Scarcely had she set foot in street than she preceived that she was followed by a man, who quickened pace when she walked rapidly, and lottered when she paused at a shop wisdow to allow him to pass. There was no policeman in sight; the street was a lonely one, and there we nobody in the shops -- who se ewners o'd not adver-

III .- With a beating heart she resolved to beffle her unknown admirer and so plunged into the first open store she came to. It was a shoe store, and the proprietor could have made more money by exhibiting himself to an intelligent public as a deformity. He was, however, a kind-hearted and value man, and when she told him of her perseentions, volun teered to go out and lick o the gay Lothamo, or give him in charge of the police. IV .- 'Not so,' replied the lady;' would not have any scandal for the world, so intensely - jealous is my husband. But if you will kindly allow me to remain here a few minutes that impudent wretch, whilev r he is 'has gone by.' 'With please re, madam, replied the shoemsker, 'and if you wil take a seat behind the screen here is the customer's measuring chair' you will be shielded from view. She did so, and the shoe-maker resumed his occupation of putting an invisible patch on a woman's

V .- In the course of fifteen or twenty minutes, the lady's fears having somewhat abated, she desired the hospitable shoemaker to look out into the street and see if it was clear. He did so and returned with the gratifying intelligence that there was not a soul in sight. Thanking him for his shelter and kudness, she went to the door, looked midly up and down the Racoon and Buffalo Coats street, and see . . . . one, darted out and resumed her homeword way. Almost in- Fine Buckskin Gloves, Mitts, &c. stantly her persenter sprangout from the doorway where he had been concealed, Kid Gloves and Gauntlets. and hastened after her, this time with purpose in his steps, for he soon overhauled her, and gapping her by the arm, hissed in her nerveless ear, 'felve, and to me, and for a wall eyed, hump-back, red- Repairing and Remodelling Old headed, slab sided, knock-kneed, splaytooted cobbler! My worst auspicions are more than realized. Viper!' She fainted.
