THE PHANTON. I slept -my sleep was soft and sweet. No pain nor trouble there -Then did mine eyes a vision greet, A maid supremely fair.

Pale, pale was she as marble stone, And weird and strange to see : With a light like pearls her eyes they shone Her locks hung loose and free,

And down she lays her by my side, That maiden marble pate. Then throbs my heart like a thing possessed. With passion all aglow,

And slowly, slowly did she glide,

So phantom like and frail,

But no throb stirs that fair one's breast, She is cold as the mountain snow. My breast, it neither throbs nor beats, It is cold as the mountain snows;

But love, I know-its pangs, its sweets. Aud its all mastering throes. My lips and cheeks bloom not with red, The blood in my heart is still;

I am thine, to do thy will!" And madder still she clasped me round, Till my very breath 'gan fail; he cock crew gone, with never a sound,
