THERE ARE EYES.

In the hour when the daylight is dawning. And the skies change from gray into blue. There are eyes that are dark at the shadows . When the night fall-th gloomily down, Or blue as the flower in the meadows:

The eyes that I worship are brown,

They are brown, with the sweetest of tinting Which stretches the thought on the rack, Against every charge of a frown

For coyness is hid in their brown. At times they are sweetly uncertain Alike in their meaning and hue; Their lids are let down, as a curtain, To hide what is thought from the view; Or raised with an innocent wonder, So baby-like, simple, yet wise, That we fail what is slumbering under

To read inthe soul of the eyes, maiden? no lack of expression Sleeps under the white of the lid, My heart would fain make a confession Of all that has from the been hid. I love them, those eyes, and the maiden Who cast them so roguishly down; And all of my life shall be laden With fealty unto their brown.
