THE PINE-TREE.
Before your atoms came together
I was full grown, a tower of strength,
Seen by the sailors out at sea,
With their gulls and swallows all my length,
Making my might ministry,
Companion of the ancient weather.
Yours! Just as much the stars that shiver
When the frost sparkles overhead!
Call ye upon my lofty, airy air,
That sings in the clear vault and tread
The clouds! Less yours than that—
Those falcons swooping round the river!
In the primeval days, embowring
My broad wings with my branching peers,
My gams I stilled in precious drops—
Ay, even in those elder years
The eagle building in my tops,
Along my bones the plover overwing.
Beneath my shade the red man slipp'd,
Himself a shadow, stole away!
A jester shadow follows him!
"Fancy may go, or rascals say,"
The caldron upon my lofty air,
The winds will many a year be striping:
And there the hidden day be throwing
His fire, though dark the dead prime be,
Before the bird shake off the dew
Wh' wh' what songs have been sung to me!
What! what will be sung when you
Are dust upon the four winds blowing!
—H. P. Spofford.

It would hardly be credited that the countenance of a bull could vary in its expression, but it certainly appeared as if intense rage and demoralized had stood out upon every hair on its face, and the more it was baffled in its attempts to gore its intended victim, the deeper and wider became that expression of intense rage. One of the attendants gave the bull a more severe thrust than he intended to do, when it turned so suddenly upon him that, before he could evade the attack, the animal had him upon its horns, and ripping the body open with the exertion, sent a high in the air, while his blood spouted out upon its face. The man fell with a heavy thud upon the soil, and in an instant the bull was goring him again and again. In vain the attendants tried to draw his attention from the man, and endeavor to rescue their fallen companion from his terrible fate. In less than time it required to narrate the episode the poor fellow was
