A Clever Rogue.

Chambers' Journal:- A gentleman of great experience in the commercial world cashed a check in a London bank for £1,100, taking the whole in £100 notes. He was only a few yards from the bank when a person resembling a clerk, bareheaded and with a pen behind his ear, touched him on the shoulder, saying: Beg your pardon, sir; will you allow me just to take the number of these notes again? I won't keep you a minute.' The gentleman, taken of his guard, handed the notes over to the supposed clerk, whom he followed into the bank.

After giving the former time to reach the top end and return, he met the gentleman at the door, saying, 'Please walk this way, that gentleman will attend to you in a minute,' pointing to a clerk who was deeply engaged. Five minutes elapsed before the gentleman could draw the clerk's attention to his case, and he was thunderstruck to find that the officer knew nothing about it. The other clerks were interrogated, but they were equally in the dark. Of course, no time was lost in going to the Bank of England, but too late; the . ' er rogue had been before them and of med
