the situation at a glance, Biglin, the chief keeper, began to parley with Barrett, telling him not to make a fool of himself and to surrender. Barrett said, "If you promise not to paddle me for this I will go." Biglin, however, made no promise. Then, said Barrett, "I'll be damned if I surrender, I'll swing his formidable weapons defiantly at the officers. Over 100 convicts were cheering him on. Once more Biglin urged him to surrender, but Barrett raised his hammer and was about to hurl it at Biglin's head, when officer Good again drew his revolver and said—"Barrett, if you fire that hammer I'll shoot you." Barrett's laughter, groans, and curses were now heard from all parts of the back part of the foundry here called out, "He dare not shoot!" Then arose the cry all around the officers, "You are cowards! You dare not shoot, and it became high time to show them that they were not to be trifled with. Barrett made no promise. Then arose the cry all around the officers, "You are cowards! You dare not shoot, and it became high time to show them that they were not to be trifled with. Barrett made no promise. Then, said Barrett, "I'll be damned if I surrender, I'll swing his formidable weapons defiantly at the officers. Over 100 convicts were cheering him on. Once more Biglin urged him to surrender, but Barrett raised his hammer and was about to hurl it at Biglin's head, when officer Good again drew his revolver and said—"Barrett, if you fire that hammer I'll shoot you." Barrett's laughter, groans, and curses were now heard from all parts of the back part of the foundry here called out, "He dare not shoot!"
