

Emperor Nicholas.

General Von Kett... saw at St. Petersburg the bed-room of the Emperor Nicholas, which had been kept so long as it was when the Sovereign slept in it. The iron canopy bed with the same bedclothes, the same Persian shawl and the cloak with which he covered himself, the various little articles for the toilette, the books and maps of Sebastopol and Cronstadt—everything remains untouched; even the thoroughly worn-out slippers, which he, I believe, wore for twenty-eight years, and always would insist on having mended again. The wall clock which was set daily, stands at the day of his death. The bed stand across the middle of the room, and the last glance of the monarch through the large window fell, perhaps, on the broad, proud Neva, which his bed fostered with his barge and the golden cupola of his Isaac's Church, and on the sun sinking in the sea behind the fortification of Cronstadt. Grief at the issue of the war was the disease which killed the Emperor Nicholas. This unique character could not bend his will—he must die.
