MONDAY EV'NG, APRIL 29, 1878. A TRIFLER'S MEDITATIONS

Gives me to ride where torrents dark,
Dash madly round my venturous bark,
And circling in their wild delight,
The jutting rock, which checks their flight,
Carreer, like maddened steed, away
With all their wealth of silvery spray.
Now, must they verge with demon laugh Their course o'er the uneven path. Now, glide along so dark and still, More noiseless than the feeblest rill More noiseless than the feeblest rill.

The heavens must frown upon the scene
And sable folds of vapor screen.

The pale light of the moon,
That, struggling through th fleecy wall
Of blackening clouds, may feebly fall
Upon the scene of gloom.
No fiving voice must meet my ear.
No hand but mine my bark must steer,
Whose prow, the gloomy waters cleaves
Where—save myself—no creature breathes.
No heart but mine the danger dares.
No soul with mine the effence shares.
Then, could I stem the wid ning gulf
That shuts my image from myself
And view, by gaiety, unconfined
The borrort of my gloomy mind,
When of its glitter pride is shorn, When of its glitter pride is shorn,
And pleasure veil is rudely torn,
When gay companions are forgot—
Then would the web by fanov wrougt
Perish before the glance of thought.

THE BAPTLE OF SEDAN,

(Extract from the 'History of a Crime,' by Victor Hugo; translated from the French by M. S. Robertson.) I was returning from my fourth exile, the close of September, 1871. I was returning into France from the frontiers of Luxenbourg. I was askep in the car. All at once the stoppage of the train awakened me and I opened my eyes. The train had stepped in the mid-t of s charming landscape. I listened ; I indulged in a sweet, confused reverie. The valley was lovely and calm; the blue sky seemed as if reposing upon a fair circle of hills, and from afar came the warbling of birds. Near was bright and fair about me. This universal grace and grandeur infused into my soul a brightness like the morning

Abruptly a traveller asked, "What place is this?" Another replied "Sedan."

I beheld. The high hills are suddenly iuvaded by au immense, black army. Not a word of command. Two hundred and fifty thousand men came stealthily to enpircle the valley of Givonne. . . All is executed silently, as by spectres, in monary disease. The more prudent, aware order, without noise, through the forests, that a cough or cold should never be triffed order, without noise, through the forests, the ravines and valleys. The veliant 35th of the front disappear almost entirely beneath the crush of the shells. The brave infantry of marine holds a moment in check the com-bined Saxons and Bavarians, but, over-whelmed on all sides, it withdraws the whole of the admirable division. Marguerite, dashing against the German in-fantry, it halts and sinks in mid march, exterminated, says a Prussian report, 'exterminated, says a Prussian report,
'by a sure and steady fire.' The field of carnage has three outlets, each barred; that of Bonillon, guarded by the Prussians; that of Carignan, by the Bavarians; that of Meziere, by the Wurtembergians. The French had not thought of barricading the viaduet of the railroad, three battaliens of Germans had occupied it during the night. Two lonely houses on the route from Balan might have formed a grand centre of resistance, but the Germans are there. The German army moves like a single piece of machinery, in perfect unity. The Prince of Saxony has taken his stand upon the height of Mairy, where he governs every movement. Each moment the wall of fire approaches, the rolling of the thunder is continued the fiendish work of 80,000 men. Never had the like been seen, never before was an army aunken 'neath such a ruinous wreck, the work of Mitraille. In an hone all is lost. The regiments flee note mele into Sedan. But Sedan commences to burn; the Dijouval burns, the ambulances burn, and nothing is possible but a truce. Wempffen, brave and firm suggests it to the Emperor. The third Zuaves, in desperation, give an example to the rest separated from the srmy, they cut a passage through the fee, and reach Belgium. That was a fight of lions. Tureme and Vauban were both present there, one as a statue, the other as a cita-
