The Centennial Harvester.

(Pacific Rural Press.)

The Centennial Harvester is a combination of the ordinary header and separator. It is operated by four men and 16 horses, and is moved at the rate of from two and one half to three miles an hour. Its sickle bar is 19½ feet long, and at the speed mentioned cuts and threshes two acres of grain for each mile the machine travels. Its average cutting is from 35 to 40 acres per day. It cuts the grain the same as an ordinary header, and instead of being put into a header wagon and hauled to a stack, it is, before touching the ground, carried on an apron to the separator, when it is is threshed, run into sacks, which are sewed and dropped on the ground as the harvester moves around the field. Thus, with but one handling, the grain is headed, threshed, sacked and ready to haul out of the field to the warehouse or depot.

Mr. Cressey says he sets the harvester at work in his grain field in the morning, and at night he has from 35 to 40 acres cut, threshed and put into cars, and at five o'clock the next morning the cars were at Oakland wharf, with the wheat ready to be placed on shipboard. Charmed with this quick work, Mr. Cressey recalls the fact that from six to ten years ago (and before building of the railroad), after spending weeks in cutting, stacking and threshing his grain, he had to haul it, with teams, 60 miles to Stockton for market, consuming five and six days each trip, and at an expense at which the freight by rail diminishes into insignificance. Now he can cut his grain one day and have it in market the next, and he can dress against that ones to pay his men and expenses. This is quick work on a large scale, which we believe the world has never known before.

The cost of these machines is $2,000. This appears to be a large amount to pay for a single implement to use on a farm, but Mr. Cressey reminds us that every farmer who seeds 160 or more acres of ground, needs at least four horses for this work. Thus by using the power they already have, six farmers, adjoining each other, could unite in purchasing a harvester.
