in a natural, easy tone, not especially directing his voice to the instrument. The answer came back with such distinctness that they were understood equally well in the further corner of the store as at the mouth of the instrument, Mrs. Jewett was saked to sing, and the words of "Over There" came with all the aweetness that would have been heard if the singer had been in an adjoining room. Mr. Jewett went home and at the request of his son, took a seat eight feet from the instrument and played the "Arkansas Traveller" on his violin. Every note was heard distinctly. not only in the store, but on the street and in the rear yard, which is separated by another room from the store. The closing of a door, sweeping the floor, Jewett and others in her room all were
