

A Miser's End. A young German came to California, thirty years ago, determined to get rich. He worked hard. He lived as cheaply as possible. Every dollar that he earned he invested in real estate, or in some other profitable mode of property. The result was that he became a millionaire. Yet when his income was nearly a million a year, he lived in shabby apartments, and wore the cheapest clothing, and had no social property. He had no friends, no social enjoyment. Everybody regarded him as a cold-blooded, close-fisted, iron-hearted man.

This miser (I must) brought disease upon him by overwork, and the doctors prescribed for him a sea voyage, so he determined to visit his native land. He was to be celebrated for his wealth. He went to be buried in his native land. His parents had lived and were buried five miles distant. He thought that he would visit their graves, but being too generous to hire a carriage he walked to the graveyard. Finding at the gate that the sexton demanded a small fee for visitors he said that he would not go in. But passing around to the rear of the inclosure he climbed over the wall. He looked at the graves with interest, and then tried to go over as he had entered. The sexton, however, was too sharp for him. He caught him and took him before the burgomaster. There he was in millions denied that he had been in the graveyard at all. The sexton stoutly asserted that he had seen him climb the wall. The fatigues of his long walk, and the excitement of this allegation, brought on a paroxysm of the disease, and he fell down dead in the burgomaster's office.

Such was the 'last in earth' in the case of this miserly man. He left his wealth to relatives with whom he had scarcely any special interest, and who, though glad of course to get the money, cannot have much respect for the memory of their miserly kinsman.

Messrs. WEBER & CO. in announcing their success at the World's Fair would call the attention of the Canadian public to the fact that after the most searching examination by the International Jury their Pianos have been awarded the above Prizes. These instruments were not made for the Exhibition, but taken from Canada, being a fair representation of their Piano. This should be a proof to Canadians that Canada can produce good Pianos as the best imported instruments. SEE PRICE LIST on application. Oct. 18, 1877.
