really believe the good news. The news was almost too good. It was told me three weeks before I was liberated. I had an interview with father the day before I came away, and he was glad I was going. He was hopeful, too, of his own future. During this interview with him, he said he thought his sentence an unjust one, and trusted to get out soon—at the right time. He looked forward yet to recon-ciliation with her he believed was his wife He loved her very dearly, and thought constantly of her. He does not blame her the last for his present unhappy condition. He sent his love and blessing to all his children, and he would have I ked to send a message to Annie, but I did not think I would ever have a chance to deliver it. I still think, mychance to denver it. I still think, myself, they will yet be reconciled. I never taw any colour in her face after the engagement was broken off, until they were married. Then she appeared so happy with father. We all thought she would have come and lived at home with father.

I think she had a sort of aisterly, as opposed to a daughterly, effection for me.' Then came the SAD, SORROWPUL PARTING between the daughter and father on the following day, which Miss Sturdy des-cribes in the following language: 'Father was glad for me to come home; but was very lone some and could hardly say goodbye. He was looking very ill, and sent his love to all his children again and again. I did not like to leave him. THE JOURNEY HOMEWARD was occupied with feelings the reverse of those described in the opening of this interview. She was driven to the station, and her fare paid by the penitentiary officials. She did not like to leave her father, but liberty is sweet to all, and besides, she had a solemn duty to perform when she reached her destination She has the family to care for, and has made up her mind to do all she can to help them onward and upward in their course through life. She did not like to come home, too, because she did not know what manner of reception she would receive. But she has met WITH A PLEASANT WELCOME BACK, and is thankful. She desired the reporter who interviewed her to thank those who had so kindly interested themselves on her behalf, and trusts they will ENCES IN THE PROVINCIAL PERITER- do what they can for her father.
