DONNING THE UNIFORM.

PROBATIONARY TO REGULAR PATROLMEN.

On His Beat He is a Decided Sensation. Gets Used to It at Length-Reprinanded-Going Before the Board-On Pay

Hitherto he has worn citizen's clothes, and his star on his breast looks like the lost Pleiad. Now he dons the regulation uniform, and his star is in its natural place, resplendent in its own azure, with silver buttons that keep it. company. Now, indeed, is he a policeman. He is given a beat of his own, and he bids farewell to the old times, hoping he'll soon hear of his promotion to the sergeantcy. What a guying he gets when he first shows up around home in his uniform, and how red he gets when they sing after him: "Are ye there, More-ri-ar-i-tee?" Don't his wife think he's just the handsomest fellow out, and his children, if he has any, don't they hide under the bed from him, as they have been in the habit of doing from the regular man on the beat? He gets used to it all-the strange bours, the odd arrangement for getting his meals-and the one thing he realizes above all others is that he don't have to pay car fare on most roads. On his beat he is a sensation. The small boys flee at his approach and rack their brains in dark cellars or old woodsheds to find some nickname for him indicative of his appearance, which, having agreed on, they assail him with from every corner. He gives them chase, and soon their respective mothers come together and declare him all that's vile for frightening their children. They vow and declare they'll "have his star before he's on the force a week," which in their minds is equivalent to having his scalp or his life. He knows the ordinances and he enforces them. Women are reprimanded for sweeping garbage into alleys, small boys arrested for playing ball in vacant lots or building fires. The corner loafers try to bluff him and he clubs them.

Finally, adhering strictly to his duty, he gets into trouble as deep as by not attending to it and he is reprimanded. He moves more guardedly and still he is misunderstood. He has to exercise all his ingentity to keep out of quarrels. He is prone to chase shadowy figure through dark alleys and fire vast quantities of cartridges without hitting anything, but bringing down the maledictions of the people on his head. They declare there ain t any burglars; that the policeman's drunk and shoots at imaginary individuals like a man with delirium tremens. Time passes on and he gets thoroughly up in his duties, and eventually manages to shake up a nodding acquaintance with the residents, who treat him as if to say: "Well, he's here, and we can't get rid of him." Finally be finds himself the scandal bearer of the neighborhood, and in more hot water. If there's a fine looking servant girl on his beat he cultivates her in a mild way, and learns soon after that she is the only champion he's got, and he's thankful therefor. She's inclined to let him into the kitchen in cold weather to warm himself, which is kind of her, and he feels so good to her that when he gets acquainted with her regular "company" he'll take a social drink with him. Of course, given a single policeman, the relations between him and said "company" are strained. There are the dreary rounds of duty all the same, and finally he forgets or overlooks something and he's found out and brought before the board. It's his first time. What an awful body the board must be! He gets his notice of charges and he goes home with gloomy visage and eats absent mindedly and struggles to break it to his wife.

GOING BEFORE THE BOARD. "Kate, it's all up. I told you I couldn't "What, John? the steak? It's nice, I picked it out my"-"No, the place. I've had charges preferred against me-before the board." She imagines the board has power to send him to the penitentiary, and her face droops and her apron and her face manifest the most decided attractions for each other. But she cheers up.

"Well, never mind; it'll be all right. The sergeant is a mean old thing. I never did like a little eyed man," and she proceeds to cheer him up in the way only a woman can. He goes to bed that night. He wakes up next morning and his wife remarks that be slept horribly all night, and just raved and mumbled. No wonder! He dreamed that the sergeant cut his head off and that he picked it up himself and carried it under his arm into the board room and laid it on the floor, and the commissioners played a game of football with it.

The day of trial comes. It's not so terrible, after all, and he's only cautioned. Home he goes, his face as shining as his star, and finds out that he was foolish to worry, and his wife had told him just how it would end.

Back again to his beat and the dismal round again. In summer he melts and in winter he freezes. He gets wet by the rain or slips on the ice. He walks and walks and half dozes, falls into little half dreams and awakes with a start and goes more rapidly. He is lonesome at night and he'd like to be home. Every one knows how cheerless and bleak his life must be on winter nights. He picks up freezing drunkards who abuse and even try to kill him, and must walk benumbed till daylight and breakfast time. At any time a struggle with burglars, or thieves, or footpads may come upon him. A burglary on his beat means a bitter reprimand. He must be at fires, must see that order is kept at parties and must attend to a thousand things the public know nothing of whatever. All a policeman's duties he never learns. Many of them are but the whims of superiors. On pay day he goes to the city hall and draws his check, and goes to the bank to get it cashed. Then on his way home he loads himself with packages, and bundles, and bags, and hies for home laden like the dromedary of the desert, but very happy, for they'll feast that day at his house if he loses his head for it. Then his wife pays all the bills in the neighborhood, and she goes out visiting, and everything is happiness.—Globe-Democrat.

With Tipping Banished.

The agitation against tipping would be a good thing for the colored man, if it should be successful. With tipping banished, the negro would have a better chance of getting work. As it is now, in cases where everything else is equal, the white man will be chosen simply because of the negro's thirst for tips. A man who lives that way will not treat patrons right. He gets partial, and thus often drives away trade. Colored men are universally so eager for tips that a patron feels constrained to tip him for services for which he would not dream of feeing a white man. In this respect the colored man is his own worst enemy. He may seem to make his income greater, but in reality he is cheapening his work and making his services less desirable to those bosses who do not wish their customers to feel in any way obligated to pay the servant.-Head Waiter in Globe-Democrat.

A banjourine is an instrument designed for lady players and several actresses will use it in musical comedies next season. It is a banjo with a big body and short neck.

Young Edward Gould, who has been cutting a figure lately by big speculations on the Consolidated Stock and Petroleum Exchange, says he gets no tips from his father. According to current reports Jay Gould is proud of the boy's spirit, and an intimate of the Gould family says the lad has cleared $500,000 in stocks since New Year.

Ex-Governor Cornell, of New York, is a man of strong domestic tastes. His present home is a large mansion with spacious grounds, situated just beyond Mt. St. Vincent, within the limits of Yonkers, overlooking the Hudson and the Palisades. Persons who have to do with Mr. Cornell in business or official matters often speak of him as cold and stern. Within the family circle, however, he is a man of most warm hearted geniality.

Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton has lately visited Oscar Wilde in London. "The 'Apostle of the Beautiful' has," she says, "a pretty wife and a pretty house. I found his dainty, cream colored dining room especially attractive. I think it must be an original design, this delicate white room, white walls, white chairs, white cabinets, a white shelf a foot wide running round the walls at a convenient height-not a trace of color anywhere, save in the rare glass and china and the flowers and fruit on the well spread table. Oscar Wilde tells the best stories of any one I know, and the only fault I could find with some he told was that they were too good to be true."
