PERILS OF THE SEA.

AWFUL TRIALS OF THE D CHAPIN'S CREW.

They Recall the Loss of the Ville du Havre in 1873-Floating for Days in Open Boats-The Pangs of Hunger and of Thirst.

OULD we rescue from old ocean's den tales of human anguish which lie there, we could by before our readers tales of adventure of absorbing interest and tales of sufering most appalling. Many a poor fellow has sailed away from port and never been heard from, but occasionally the veil of the sea is lifted and there comes to us the pitiful story of some-shipwrecked crew. who have been rescued from a watery grave.

The picture of distress given to us by the survivors of the bark D. Chapin, which was wrecked in a hurridane on Christmas day, has been rarely equaled. They were ten-days without food, and during that long period they drifted about in a rudderless boat at the mercy of the wind and sea, with scarcely any. hope of succor. The situation these men found themselves in contains too fine an anguish to be portrayed in cold type. Death would have been a relief to them, but they clung to life with the tenacity which all men show when in danger of losing it.

The most remarkable portion of their story, which a landsman might doubt, but which o'd sea dogs declare is undoubtedly true, illustrates the occasionally peculiar action of son waves.

AFLOAT-IN AN OPEN EOAT.

The chief mate, one of the seven survivers of the doomed vessel, tells the story. He and the captain were standing on the quarter deck, congratulating themselves on the way the vessel was riding. The wind was blowing half a hurricane and the sea was running high. Suddenly a huge wave broke over the doomed vessel's bow with terrific force. Another followed close after, and she was immediately thrown on her beam ends. Any one who has stood on the seashore and watched the waves coming in, will have noticed that a succession of four light waves will be followed by two heavy We be to the ignerant one who, during the lull, tries to see how near he can stand to the water without getting wet. The big fifth wave will dash down on him, and, unless he is quick, his shoes will get a bad dose of salt water. This action occurred in the case of the doomed bark. While the captain and mate were congratulating themselves, the two big waves were rearing up in the distance, and bore down on the vessel with irresistible force, swamping her and compelling the crew to jump for their lives into the only lifeboat left. The mate says the boat was swept away from the vessel's deck five times, and five times was swept back, each time receiving more additions from the deck of the wreck, until all the crew had been taken off. The undertow would undoubtedly have continued to carry the boat back to its original resting place, until the vessel sank beneath the waves, had not the crew used their oars after the last man had been taken off.

Old sailors tell us that it is not an unusual thing for a man to be swept overboard in a heavy gale of wind, and immediately returned to the vessel's deck by the undertow.

The many wrecks that have occurred recently, and the tales of sallering detailed in the columns of the press, call to mind the. sea disasters of the past. A New York correspondent sends us a reminiscence of the loss of the steamer Ville du Havry, The Ville du Havre was a French steamer. She left New York on Nov. 15, 1873, with more than 300 souis on board. On the morning of the 23d she came in collision, in mid ocean with the sailing ship Loch Earn, bound from London to New York. Within twelvo minutes after the collision the Ville du Havre sauk, carrying down 226 men, women and children. The crash came in the darkness of the night. Many of the passengers were killed in their berths. Only eighty-seven persons were saved. They were picked up by the boats of the Loch Earn. The purser of the ill-fated steamer afterward gave a graphic account of the disaster. He was a good swimmer, and immediately jumped overboard and made his way in the direction of the Lock Earn. The air was filled with the cries of the drowning passengers. He turned around in the water and looked back on the steamer. Just at this moment a dreadful shrick filled the air, and the Ville du Havre plunged bow first into the waves. In the afternoon the ship Trimountain, commanded by Capt. W. W. Urquhart, sighted the wreck, bore down and took off the survivors rescued from the Ville du ... Havre. They were destitute of clothing, and the cold being severe, they suffered intensely. Capt. Urquhart cared for them as well as was possible under the circumstances, and landed them safe in Cardiff. The survivors of this terrible calamity expressed their gratitude by protenting the captain with a beautiful silver salver, with their names engraved upon it. To this day it occupies a prominent place in his home in New York.

LOSS OF THE VILLE DU HAVRE.

One can scarcely understand the inhuman barbarity which will prompt a man to pass by a vessel in distress without a sign of recognition, and yet this has been done in many instances. In an interview with our correspondent, Capt. John Urquhart, who, by the way, is a brother of the ceptain of the Tri-mountain, told of an experience of his which he will not be likely to forget. In the early part of 1863 he sailed in the bark Union from Cette, which is a small seaport town bordering on the Gulf of Lyons, in the Mediterranean. After passing through the Straits of Gibraltar his vessel met with a succession of gales, which completely disabled her. Her decks were swept, and the water logged vessel was in imminent peril of sinking at any moment. For twelve days the vessel remained in this condition, with a signal of distress flying at the mast head. One day a vessel passed so close to them that with a glass they could distinguish the twelve letfers of her name. But the inhuman captain passed on and left them to their fate. They were afterward rescued, but the captain says he never shall forget his feelings when the vessel, which might easily have aided them, passed out of sight.

Davis ran a footrace with M. H. Harrison, of Windsor, and lost. The former sava Schlesinger Bros. bet between $500 and $700 on him, and now claim that the threw the race. Kittleman, the well-known sprinter, was also arrested on suspicion but after an investigation he was released.

It is said that Stearns resigned the presideucy of the Detroits on account of disgnst at the parsimony of Stockholder Vail. He invited the reporters to travel at the expense of the club when the series for the world's championship with the Browns was p'aved. Vail objected to the item of expense, whereupon Mr. Stearns paid the money over to the club from his own funds, and at once resigned, to the general consternation of the directors.
