HAWTHORNDEN.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY. Though Scotia hath a thousand scenes To strike the traveller's eye, Clear-bosomed lakes, and leaping streams, And mountains bleak and high; Yet when he seeks his native clime And ingle-side again, T would be a pity, had he missed To visit Hawthornden.

Down, down, precipitous and rude, The rocks abruptly go, While through their deep and narrow gorge Foams on the Esk below; Yet though it plunges strong and bold, 'ts murmurs meet the ear,
Like ft. 'tful childhood's weak complaint,

Half smo. hered in its fear. There's plenty, in my own dear land, Of cave and wild c. "scade, And all my early years a "ere spent

In such romantic glade; And I could featly climb the cha Or fores, roam and fen; But I've been pazzled here among These rocks of Hawthornden. Here, too, are labyrin, thine paths To caverns dark and Low.

Wherein, they say, king h obert Bruce Found refuge from his fce; And still amid their relics old His stalwart sword they keep, Which telleth tales of cloven heads And gashes dire and deep:

While sculpture I in the yielding stone Full many a niche they show, Where erst his library he stored, (The guide-boy told us so.) Sight need had he of books, I trow, Mid hordes of savage mer, And precious little time to read At leagured Hawthornden.

Loud pealing from those caverns drear, In old disastrous times, The Covenanter's nightly byma Upraised its startling chimes; Here too they stoutly stood at bay, Or frowning sped along, To meet the highborn cavalier In conflict fierce and strong.

And here's the hawthern-broided nook, Where Drummond, not in vain, Awaited his inspiring muse, And wo ed her dulcet strain. And there's the oak, beneath whose shade He welcomed tuneful Ben, And still the memory of their words Is nursed in Hawthernden.

Flowers! Flowers! how thick and rich they grow, Along the garden fair,

And sprinkle on the dewy sod Their gifts of fragrance rare. Methinks from many a heather bell Peeps forth some fairy lance, And then a tiny foot protrudes All ready for the dance;

Methicks 'neath you broad laurel leaf They hold their revels light, mprinting with a noiseless step The mossy carpet bright; And then their ringing laughter steals From some sequestered glen.
A fitting place for fays to sport Is pleasant Hawthornden.

I were sweet indeed to linger here, And list the streamlet's sound, And see poetic fancies spring Up, like the flowers ar und. Ip, as the creeping ivy wreathes Its green and gadding spray, And from the gay and heartless crowd Steal evermore away.

Yes, sweet, if life were but a dream, And we, on charmed ground, Were free to choose at pleasure's call, And not to judgment bound.
