of a Crowd of People.

A Webberville, Mich, despatch says The cry of "Fire!" aroused the people shortly before midnight last night, and they rushed from their homes to find the town lockup in flames. It was a one-story wooden structure standing alone in an oper square. Above the crackling of the flames crics were heard from an inmate of one of the cells. When the citizens arrived the doomed man seen frantically beating the bars of his cell and crying for help. The people were powerless to rescue him and in the presence of the crowd he slowly roasted to were framed by the black, unyielding bars of his cell door. Little by little he was forced back, but only when the bars became red hot did he abandon all hope of escape. ## WICKEDNESS IN HIGH PLACES.

With His Creditors and His Mistress, A London cable says : The examination of Mr. Borlage, ex-Under-Secretary of the Local Government Board, was continued in the Bankruptcy Court yesterday. He admitted having borrowed £1,000 from Madame de Quiros, who was formerly his mistress, but he said the money was his own, and she had simply restored it to him. He had never promised to settle £1,500 upon her. She asked him, he said, for £500 down and £1,500 a year, saying that she was going to get the same amount out of another man. He dined at her house after borrowing the £1,000, when she tried to murder him. After getting the sum mentioned he borrowed £2,700 from her, giving his acceptance for that amount. He heard afterward that this money had been given that his money had been largely expended in political life for elections, dinner parties, ate. How the Sparrows Keep Warm.

How do the sparrows keep warm these nights? From the way they chatter in the trees and about the leaves, it may be sup. posed that they have comfortable nights somewhere. But sometimes they make a bold and desperate shift. A citizen says that one evening while passing a pole upon which a number of fowls roosted, he was surprised to see several sparrows fly away from the roost. Not fully satisfied with his conclusion-that the birds were roosting under shelter of the fowls-he stepped behind a board fence to watch for a verification. Presently the birds began to return and alight within a few feet of the roost then one, with more courage than any of the others, flew over and alighted squarely on the back of a large rooster, and moment later disappeared between the feathers of the reester and a hen at his side. Soon the other sparrows began to settle be tween the fowls, and in a short time all had found a warm shelter from the storm, and protection from noxious animals beneath the soft feathers of the good-natured fowls. -London Free Press.
