All these created that "auri sacra fames" offence in Estelle, according to the mother's way of looking at things, as were Mr. Clanricarde's speculations in the House, whereby a thousand became five hundred, and percentage was the "peau de chagrin" which every touch made smaller. In this momentous question of her marriage Mrs. Clanricarde assumed to know better than her daughter; and perhaps she was not far wrong in her assumption. Charlie Osborne had everything that a romantic girl adores, but that a far-seeing mother despises as the foundation of the home and family; and with Mrs. Clanricarde the mother's outlook overlapped the daughter's romance.

It made no difference in the ordering of things that no eligible parti was at hand to take up the silver thread, which she was resolved Charlie Osborne should not hold. The few moneyless curates, the one scantily endowed vicar, and the one rosy-gilled doctor, who made up the bachelordom of Kingshouse, were not a whit more desirable half so taking. And Caleb Stagg, the only son and heir of old Miles Stagg, the wealthy owner of Redhill and a former coal-miner, was impossible-at least to Estelle, if Mrs. Clanricarde would have shut her eyes and swallowed the gilded sausage whole. But the chapter of accidents has a long coda; and the chapter of accidents in the lifestory of a lovely girl of twenty has only
