DEER HUNTING IN THE NORTH.

By Editor Tell of his personal and Varied Experiences While Searching for Game and Recreation in the Wilderness.

However all is well that ends well, and when after repeated volleys from the rifle and an extensive use of language the parties having the honor were made to understand there were no deer to be had. They soon got to land. There stood the dog, on the top of the highest hill in the vicinity of camp expatiating on his inability to kill deer. With stentorian voice and exultant air he was explaining to those present "just how it was done." From his excited story the party gathered that he had seen the deer, pursued by the hounds, as it bounded from hill to hill, laying his course directly for the "Narrows" where he was watching. As the animal reached the water edge he commenced firing and finally when about half way across the narrow inlet the deer turned towards deep water. The boat was quickly launched and a stern chase was on for rods and then cast up his rifle and fired a shot or two and then resumed the chase. Finally the animal was struck with a ball that placed his last end about the hounds knife at the throat. It will take years to efface that last week's memory to the hunter. He told the boys of his marvelous presence of mind during the exciting event. Of course the story had to be repeated to each fresh arrival of scouts, and of course he was ever ready to start off and entertain them. During their peregrinations over the hills the historian and agent kept their weather eye open for specimens of minerals and every hill and valley traversed by them was carefully scanned with the hope that something valuable would be discovered. Powerful looking rock and every pebble similar looking rock and as soon as a new museum was stored away for future examination and by the time the party broke camp a full half-bushel of these specimens had been collected. A general assortment of the collector was made and a valuable assortment brought away. It was finally arranged to break camp and a start was made for the journey. It was decided that part of the party should be sent by train to the station and that it would be necessary to take one of the horses and the wagon and get what was going that way, out to the station. The historian and agent were detailed for that purpose, and a trip made to the house of the settler where one animal was hitched to the "Jumper" and the other to the wagon and a start made to bring the luggage out to the clearing. While this was being done the remainder of the party were busy in packing up each individuals share of the goods and chattels and loading the whole into the boats, a couple of trips being necessary to get all the stuff to the landing. From there it is a long haul, transported on the "Jumper" out to the point where a wagon could be brought in and four trips were necessary to get it all out. Here a thorough overhauling was made in order to see that every one's share had been packed in the right place. Dinner time came on before this was accomplished and a real backwoods cook was prepared by the extemporaneous. The lashings of the stove were cast loose and that useful adjunct to the culinary department, placed on a huge log, a roaring fire was going. Potatoes were prepared, meat tripped, toast made, tea drawn and the remnants of the desert cans divided up. For our final dinner in the backwoods the morning exercises were given, the party got upon their feet, the goods of the historian and fox hunter were placed in the little wagon and with the agent as teamster and the historian as rear guard, on foot, a distance of made for the station, a distance of miles. The party was not gifted with the greatest patience and wanted to run up hill and walk down and as the road was somewhat rough the driver had hard work to keep the trunks from hopping out over the horizon. When about two-thirds of the distance had been covered the historian mounted on top of the trunk in order to get, as he thought, a rest, but alas, he found it harder work to retain his seat than it was to keep up with the wagon on foot. The station was reached at last and the goods placed in charge of the agent, and the return journey commenced. On the way back the party was confided the task of repairing the wagon broken on the journey in, and while the charges were very moderate the quality of the work was in keeping with the charge. Many a hearty peal of laughter reverberated through the gloom as the two hunters cast admiring glances on the beautiful proceeding and superior artistic design of the rejuvenated wheel. When they arrived at the settlers they found that Josiah had only made one trip from the last camp to the place where the winter sleep preparatory to separating from home was to be made. The original design was to have been to pitch the tent somewhere near the roadside, but a settler who had just vacated a log house, granted the party the privilege of occupying the same kitchen for the night. This was specifically utilized for the purpose by putting up the stove, hanging the tent around three sides of the building, and a quantity of hay was brought in and spread over the part devoted to sleeping quarters, and everything made ready for the arrival of Josiah and the remainder of the party with the load of luggage. But the best laid plans of mice and men will go for naught. Josiah had looked in the harness and declared that he was not going to kill his horse, all in one day dragging out the luggage and shouldering his rifle started for the place where he had left the gun across the camp equipage. He persuaded them to leave the stuff and they would all go off for a final hunt and show "them other fellows" that they could surprise a hunt before they left the woods. Taking the dog and placing his companions on imaginary runways he started off. One two and three hours passed and the thoroughly benumbed hunters waited and watched for Josiah units and nearly dark, when despairing of getting the clearing. It was pitch dark before they met Josiah who coolly informed them that the "farnal dogs" would not go at his bidding so he had concluded to have a still hunt "all by himself." Hungry and footsore he reached our extempore bivouac to find that nothing had been done towards getting the last load out to the clearing and his hope of getting either was to take the settler to take his horse in and hitch to the Jumper load and haul it out. Taking a lantern, Josiah, Bert and the settler started at about seven o'clock for the stuff, this was three miles away, and meant a trip of six miles before supper or bed could be indulged in. The long weary hours never seemed as long before as they did to the hungry and tired party who still bided about ten o'clock the party returned to camp amidst the horse, Jumper or supplies. The carcasses of the deer had been piled on the Jumper with the other articles and the horse smelling the blood became unmanageable and with a bound he wrecked the Jumper, separated the somewhat frayed harness into fragments, and freed himself from his driver and with head and tail up he started for his stable. There was nothing to be done but to trade back to the Jumper and take Josiah's horse and make another attempt. The same party went back and with ropes and wishes succeeded in patching up the Jumper and without further mishap the load was safely landed at the desired spot. The party was hastily packed, the bedding spread on the hay and soon all were trying to drown dull care in a sweet repose. At daylight next morning the camp was struck, the Jumper and the load was started off with best wishes. The rest of the party started for the station on foot or five miles reached the train and there they were warmly welcomed. They were then taken to the depot where they were met by their friends and the party dispersed to their several avocations and settle down to the every day routine of daily life. If it should ever be our good fortune to engage in a similar expedition we hope to be a far more interesting story than this one just finished.

WESTPORT.

SATURDAY, JAN. 10.—Like Parnell's popularity the municipal elections for the offices of Mayor and Councilors for the township of North Crosby for 1891 are a thing of the past and similar to that same worthy's feelings regarding the popularity of the masses.

Mr. Westwood, our new school master opened our public pedagogic institution on Jan. 8th.

Mr. A. W. Shields has accepted the position of agent for the "British Empire Mutual Life Insurance Co." and reports good success.

Mr. M. C. Ewing has taken his departure for Eschville. His absence at the College Institute in the ambitious city is a grand example of what pluck and brains will do.

Mr. W. G. Ewing has resigned his position of Principal of our public school, which he had successfully held for 23 years and since then has obtained a first class certificate and is now on a fair way to knock the first year honor examinations of Toronto University higher than Gilderoy's kite.

A joint temperance meeting was held in the Methodist church on Wednesday evening to discuss the question of Prohibition. Petitions are now on the move to terminate the liquor traffic.

All winter goods will be sold at special low prices this month at G. W. Bell's.

By the closing down of Ferguson's in the Mahoning and Shenango Valleys, some 8,000 to 10,000 men will be left idle. Another 10,000 men will be thrown out of employment by the consolidation of the harvest manufacturing companies into one.

Let's reason together. Here's a firm, one of the largest in the country, set by step through the years to greatness—and it sells patent medicines!

Let's see! "That's enough!"

This firm pays the newspapers good money (expensive work, this advertising!) to tell the people that they have faith in what they sell, so much faith that if they can't benefit or cure they don't want any more of it. Their medicines are not medicine and that's about all that's in them.

Suppose every sick man and every feeble woman tried these medicines and found them worthless—who would be the loser, you or they?

The medicines are Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery," for blood diseases, and his "Favorite Prescription," for woman's peculiar ailments. If they help towards health, they cost $1.00 a bottle each. If they don't, they cost nothing!
