Upon removing the top of the skull she surgeons found that the brain was herribly congested, and that the skull had been fractured by a blow or a fall. The fracture extended from the base of the skull | upward almost to the spex, from the opening of the internal car, to a length of nearly six inches, and backwards to a point about two toches to the right of the median line. It was quite apparent to those who ex amined the fracture that it was not made by a sharp instrument, and from appearances it would seem that one blow or fall would have caused the whole injury.
