The poor old man had evidently been dead for over a week. Beside the body was found a bottle capable of holding three ounces of laudanum, in which perhaps a fifth of the quantity remained. It bore the label of Hugh Miller & Co., King street, Toronto. In one of the pockets was found a letter written in a tremulous hand upon a sheet of note paper. The letter was written in ink, but so irregular in form as to raise the belief that it had been penned in the dark. It read as follows: John Taylor is my name I leave this world for ever. Laudanum had indeed been the cure. The dose taken must have produced death very quickly. The clerks at Miller's drug store do not remember selling the laudanum, saying that such a large dose is only sold for horse medicine. The remains were taken to Little York and Coroner Britton notified. After inquiry he came to the conclusion that the case was one of snicide and decided not to hold an inquest. The funeral will take place this afternoon at 6 o'clock.

John Taylor, the man alluded to in the note, is the grandson of the old man and there seems to be little ground for his grandfather's last words. He wished the old gentleman to live with him but he refused, saying he would rather live with the case, Mr. Keith, an old friend.
