It is now generally admitted, says Youths' Composion, that constipation is productive of serious disorders, that it aggrevates other adments, increases the susceptibility of the system to infectious discusses, and produces a state of general physical disturbance. The nervous system is especially sollicited, and it must be remembered this the nervous entres are in the brain.

The deleterious effects of consti were formerly explained by the pressure of the hardened mass on the blood vosels and nerves of the intestines. But a ifferent view is now taken. It is believed that they are due to powerful poisons, which have proved to be developed in the process of incipient decomposition.

There is reason to believe that extreme
