The plaintiff might as well have alleged that the defendants had expelled him from the Congress of the United States if he had been a member of it. Judge McAdam thus datines the church as viewed by the law: The church rules in matters ecologisatical and the State in matters civil. The legal notion of a church is a consecrated place dedicated to the worship of God by persons united by profession of when, in the regular exercise of that power, not sufficient to enable him to say whether a member is expelled, the courts have no control over the matter. Grisvances of this personal character should not be aired in a court, with the publicity sure to follow, but settled within the confines of the church to which the party holones and wherein they originated.
