The crucial question is : "Will France give Italy prompt satisfaction for this unprovoked complications with the peace triangle. made the impression merely that a workofficial despatches from other sources indicated that the Italians had not lifted a hand in provocation but had been killed off by the dozen merely on account of their

Emperor William at once obtained through the German embassy in Rome copious reports of the affair, and instructed Count Munster, German Ambassador in Paris, to send to Berlin as soon as possible all ascertainable details as to the fight at Aigues-Mortes and the attitude of France towards Italy's demand for reparation. The general understanding is that the Emperor is preparing to stand behind Italy is her determination to obtain satisfaction from the French Government, The accounts of the massacre which have been telegraphed at length from Italian sources to the Berlin press are quite differ-ent from the French despatches. The idea fostered by the French statement was that about 200 French workingmen and as many Italians, after mutual provocation, did some hot fighting, which resulted in the killing or wounding of the most belligerent combatants. In fact the Frenchmen numbered nearly 1,000, while there were but 150 Italians. About 400 of the Frenchmen were armed with revolvers or ifies. They marched down to the salt vorks where the Italians were employed with the avowed intention of driving them out, if not worse.

For a short time the police made a pretense of protecting the Italians, but they were so half-hearted in their measures that the Italians became convinced that they must take care of themselves and Loss $150,000, insurance $2,300. burried to a farmhouse near the works.
