THE WORD IS ALLERGIC

The new word is "allergic," a contribution of medicine to the language of literature and small talk. Do you break out in a rash when you sniff cat-nip? You're allergic to cat-nip. Do you get bumps when you sit on a horse-hair sofa? You are allergic to horse-hair sofas. Do your hands tremble when you pick up a glass of whiskey? You are allergic to whiskey. . . . It seems that every one of us is allergic, one way or another. Some people are allergic to Bach, others to the paintings of the surrealists. (The symptoms in the one case are a look of profound boredom, in the other a faint frothing at the mouth.) Most husbands are allergic to their wives and vice versa. . . . Mussolini is allergic to Anthony Eden, screen stars are allergic to marriage, small boys are allergic to soap. . . . Even we-to introduce a personal note-a.e allergic. We're allergic to "allergic." For it promises to be another of those medical catch-phrases like "inferiority complex" and "neurosis" and "sex" that people ride to death on the highways of conversation, gumming up the traffic and forcing decent vehicles of wit and erudition into the ditches.
